The Mayoralty Election

TO THE ELECTORS OF NAPANEE

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—All the Candidates for the Mayoralty Election having withdrawn, except Mr. Charles Stevens and myself, I take this method of informing you that I am in the field to the finish. I cannot see you all personally before polling day, but will be pleased and complimented with your votes and influence. I have been a resident and taxpayer of this town for twenty two years. My interests are all here and they are identical with yours, for low taxation and good honest municipal government, irrespective of party, creed, or class. I have had previous municipal experience here and elsewhere.

THOS. JAMIESON.

Napanee, January 3rd. 1895.

MUNICIPAL NOMINATIONS.

A large crowd congregated in the town hall on Monday evening, in the closing shade of the old year, for the purpose of nominating municipal officers and school trustees for the present year. At half past seven o'clock Mr. James Herring, Town Clerk, declared the meeting open, and explained briefly the laws governing such nominations. Nominations came in rather slow at first, but got brisker towards the last. The following candidates were nominated.

For Mayor—Chas. Stevens, by H. W. Huff and John Wagar; Thos Jamieson, by Geo. A. Cliff and Miles S. Plumley; S. C. Warner, by H. M. Deroche and Orr Herring; T. G. Davis, by M. W. Scott and John Briggs.

For Reeve—John Carson, by W. D. Madden and Chas. Knight.

For Deputy Reeve—Thos. Symington, by J. J. Perry and A. E. Paul; Dr. Meng, by F. W. Arnott and Chas Frizzell.

For Councillors, West Ward—Dr. Leonard, by M. W. Scott and M. C. Jackson; John Lowry, by C. W. Knight and F. Bowen; Thos E. Anderson, by J. S. Hulett and M. C. Jackson; W. T. Waller, by W. H. W. Daly and Orr Herring; W. H. W. Daly, by M. W. Scott and John Briggs; S. R. Miller, by W. T. Waller and W. H. W. Daly.

Centre Ward—J. Aylsworth, by E. S Lapum and T. G. Davis; J. F. McAlister, by Dr. Leonard and J. S. Hulett; T. S. Henry, by Donald McLiver and T. G Davis; M. S. Madole, by J. S. Hulett and M. W. Scott; Wm. Burns, by J. W. Schryver, and Wm. Greer; J. W. Robinson, by T. G. Davis and F. Arnott.

East Ward—Dr. Ward, by P. M. McCabe and Peter Post; W. S. Herrington, by Jas. Lee and O. Herring; Alf. Alexander, by J. F. McAlister and S. R. Miller; A. W. Wagar, by J. W. Schryver and Robt. McMillan; A. E Paul, by W. T. Waller and J. S Hulett; John Fennell, sr. by G. Joy and H. Lowry.

School Trustees, West Ward—W. S. Herrington, by T. D. Pruyn and Orr Herring.

Centre Ward—H. M. Deroche, by Dr. Leonard and T. D. Pruyn; Miss Margaret Shirley, by D. Henwood and D. McLiver.

East Ward—Miles S. Plumley, by Peter Post and Thos. McCallum; Wm. Templeton, by Orr Herring and John Fennell, sr.

J. Aylsworth, W. S. Herrington and W. T. Waller, handed in their resignations to the nominations as councillors.

The statutory time for the receiving of nominations having elapsed, the Town Clerk then declared John Carson, Reeve of Napanee, and W. S. Herrington, school trustee for West Ward, by acclamation.

On motion James Herring was appointed chairman of the meeting, and Dr. Ward, the Finance Minister of the Town, called upon for a statement of the Financial condition of the Town. The doctor handled this perplexing and difficult subject to explain, in view of the short time at his disposal, in a very able manner. He showed that the town was in a better condition financially, everything considered, than at any previous period. He spoke of the increased expenditure in the street department, and thought if the work done was compared with previous years, they would be of the opinion that the money spent was wisely expended.

G. F. Ruttan and Geo. Goodwin had a few questions to ask, and Mr. Ruttan was induced to ascend the platform, and make a short speech.

Mayor Stevens was the next speaker, and delivered a very happy address. He was pleased to look into their smiling faces once more, and asked them for their votes. He was not one of those men who at home and abroad were always crying down the town. He thought we had as fine a little town as there was in Ontario. It would compare favorably with any town in the Province in the matter of walks, streets, etc. He had glided into the position of mayor last year without any effort of his own. He was sensible of the honor conferred upon him, and if elected for another year would do all in his power to promote the best interests of the town. He was in the field to stay and although he might make mistakes occasionally he generally came out at the right end of the horn at the finish.

Reeve elect Carson was next called upon, but had no desire to make a speech. He thanked them for the honor, and wishing them the compliments of the season retired amid great applause.

"Here I am again" said the deputy reeve. His object in again appearing before the electors was that there were certain abuses in the county council that he wished to see rectified before he laid down the cudgels of war. He wished to be present at the county council to protest against the custom now in vogue there of several representatives clubbing together and foisting objectionable bills on the county. He wished also to be present to aid in having established in this county a House of Refuge in which to keep the unfortunate poor. The interests of economy and humanity called for a change in providing for the poor of the county. Over $600 had been expended by the town council during the past year in providing for the poor of Napanee. It had always fell to his lot to have to fight his way and he supposed that he would have to go on fighting to the end. He had been censured for the increased expenditure in the street department. There was just two questions that the ratepayers need ask themselves. Were the improvements made, necessary? Was the money spent in making these necessary improvements wisely or unwisely spent? Ever since he had entered the council they had to do with large works. That would of course not come up again, such as the new swing bridge, a new watering cart, etc. When he took charge of the streets they had been let run for a number of years and were in a bad state of repairs. He went in for doing good work, and doing what was needed as cheaply as possible. Under his predecessor $1 a load had been paid for metal for the streets, he had paid but 50c. a load, thus getting two loads for what was formerly paid for one. During his tenure of office they had cut down the salaries of the town officers by $800, and this saving had been applied to the streets. He did not see why some arrangement could not be arrived at between the candidates in the field to render an election unnecessary. It would mean a saving of $100. If there was one third of the gentlemen in this house expressed themselves in favor of Dr. Meng, or of his nominator, he would resign at once. He would like to see some arrangement arrived at whereby an election would be unnecessary, and then you know we could apply the money saved to improving the roads. Wishing them all the compliments of the season, Mr. Symington retired amid great applause.

Thos. Jamieson said it would please him very much if Mr. Stevens would be as courteous as he was last year and withdraw in his favor. He would not attempt to critize the work of the last council, but promised if elected to devote his time to the interests of the town.

T. G. Davis said he had been a resident of the town nearly all his life, and if elected would work for the best interests of Napanee.

W. S. Herrington on rising to address the electors thanked them for the honor conferred on him of electing him as school trustee by acclamation. He was pleased that the nominations of school trustees took place on the same night as that of municipal nominations. He claimed that

Dr. Ward would not make a speech in view of the time he had taken up at an earlier period in the evening. As Mr Anderson was not present he would like to reply to Mr. Lowry's statement about the town hall, however. The statement was quite in keeping with Mr. Lowry. It showed about how much he knew of municipal affairs. The repairs would not exceed $500 and he believed they had been paid for as the work was done.

W. W. Daly would not make a speech. He intended remaining away during the election and would not canvass for votes

S. R. Miller would not state definately that he was in the field to stay.

J. F. McAlister, who is one of the pleasantest speakers in the old council, was greeted with much applause and his address listened to with evident interest. He was appealing to the electors for the fourth time. On the first occasion they had elected him with a majority of one. Next year they doubled it. Last year they returned the compliment by doubling it again and he had no doubt they would do as much, if not more, for him this year. He had one reason for wishing to be returned for 1895. As chairman of the Poor and Sanitary committee he had perceived the great necessity for providing a suitable place for the poor. No one who has not had actual experience in the matter is aware of the extent of the charity that is really required to provide often a bare sustenance for the poor in a town of the size of Napanee. He believed that this time next year they would have a House of Refuge. Turning to the expenditures on the town hall he pointed out that the interests of true economy called for them. We were now paying $300 a year for an inefficient fire alarm. The repairs to the old council chamber and the town hall and purchasing the proposed fire alarm would cost in the neighborhood of $1200. As an offset they would Military Brutality.

The German army has long been notorious for the brutal manner in which the private soldiers were treated by the non-commissioned and other officers. The system was inaugurated by the great Frederick, and the military authorities since his day seemed unwilling to allow it to die out. Happily, the present emperor seems determined to have none of it. His imperial rescript on the subject of forbidding any officer to strike his men made some sensation when it was issued, though it was commonly said in army circles that it would soon be a dead letter. A few recent cases prove the contrary. A well-known officer was recently dismissed the service with ignominy for the offence of striking a man in the ranks—the emperor personally endorsing the order for his dismissal with a severe and cutting remark. At Breslau, a sergeant who was charged with ill-treating a soldier, was tried for the offence by a council of war, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in a fortress and, when his sentence has expired to rejoin his regiment as a soldier of the second class. NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

SANDHURST.

Mr. Editor. Owing to the great amount of business done in our small village especially at this time of the year, I have been unable to give you the news of this place for the past few weeks.

Mr. Harry Phippen made a trip to market on Tuesday. He reports everything on the move.

Mr. P. Loyst and Mr. J. Carroll are once more in the field for the office of Mayor. They are busy convassing for votes.

Mr. and Mrs. M. Switzer spent Tuesday in Sillsville.

BELL ROCK.

Winter is here at last and is trying to make up for lost time.

Those who attended the Christmas Arch at Moscow, report a very pleasant time.

A few of the boys are home from the shanties to spend the holidays.

At the annual school meeting Sidney Grant was appointed school trustee.

Wm. Moir gave a party to a select ... of friends the other evening.

... A. Martin has gone to Michigo visit her daughters at Gladwin and Jackson.

Mrs. Florence Switzer has returned home to Michigan after nearly two absence.

Rumor has it that a couple of weddings have taken place with more to follow.

J. W. Percy, Parkham, is in town to-day.

Mr. Bennett and wife, Black River, N.Y., are the guests of Wm. Reynolds.

LITTLE CREEK.

The anniversary sermons last Sabbath preached in Anderson's church by Rev. J. P. Wilson. B. A., of Colborne, were eloquent and sound. The congregation was good.

The oyster supper on New Year's night will be a time long remembered. The church was well filled. At an early hour they began to serve up the bivales, and other good things in abundance. After all had feasted sumptuously, M. S. Madole of Napanee, was called to the chair and after making some very excellent remarks, called on the Rev. David Wilson to offer prayer. A few members of the Napanee Western Methodist church choir discoursed some very fine music, Quartettes, Duetts and solos, much to the delight of the audience. Rev. J. P. Wilson was the principal speaker of the evening, giving a very interesting account of habits of the Indians in the North West, both in their savage and christian state and many other events of great interest. Rev. H. I. Allen the Pastor, made a few appropriate remarks, thanking all who had participated. Wishing all a happy New Year with many returns. Proceeds $70.00.

Your correspondent wishes the editor, staff and readers of THE EXPRESS a Happy New Year.

We have sleighing at last and bells are jingling merrily.

Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Benson spent Christmas with friends in Sidney.

Municipal elections are now on the programme.

The Christmas tree and entertainment at Bloomfield was a great success. The proceeds amounted to $66.

Miss Dollie Slater, Dressy, spent Christmas with friends in Toronto.

TAMWORTH.

Elections are all over. We had our council all elected by acclamation this year, a good plan, one which will save a good deal of expense. This is a step in the right direction for of late politics ran far too high in our small home affairs. May the day soon come when we can run our affairs without politics, and place in good men, who will do our business honestly. Mr. J. Sheilds resigned in favor of Wm. Paul, formerly deputy-reeve, and H. Shire ran for deputy-reeve, leaving Mr. Thornton, a new man to take the place for councilman.

We had a wedding here the other day. Mr. Frizzell to Miss Scriber, both of this place. We wish them much happiness.

We want snow to make good sleighing and good times.

A correspondent writes us that there was a lively time in Tamworth over the election of a school trustee, James Barry and John Fraser were nominated. The show of hands seems to have been in favor of James Barry. A poll being demanded, a great struggle was made by the different parties to elect their man. Result: James Barry 47 votes and John Fraser 45 votes. The P.P.A, and political vote seems to have been in the melee.

WILTON.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather, the concert in aid of the Sabbath school, which was to have been held on Thursday evening of last week, was postponed until New Year's Eve. This proved to be a very pleasant evening and by 7.30 o'clock, the hall was filled. Mr. W. B. Harvey, Sydenham, occupied the chair. A good programme was given by the children of the school and the choir, Mr. and Mrs. L. and M. Jordan kindly assisting. The proceeds amounted to $23. There was no watch meeting in the Methodist church as announced, as Rev. Coombe was ill.

A number from here attended nomination at Odessa, Monday, and the popular first-deputy of last year, Robert Miller was nominated as a candidate for the Reeveship. Mr. Miller is sure of a large majority at this polling place.

The remains of the late Mr. Emery, of Odessa, were placed in the Wilton vault Friday.

Well Mr. Editor I suppose you think this place is dead as you have had no items lately, but never mind it is not dead only our old correspondent is save $400 a year, $300 a year for an inefficient fire alarm and $100 on the present engineers salary. It was thought that by economizing that the expenditure in this direction could be met without exceeding the appropriations, so that no additional cost would be put on the ratepayers.

M. S Madole was pleased to see that the time for holding the nominations had been changed to the evening. That it was a wise change was evinced by the large crowd of ratepayers present. He thought the old council had done well and was in favor, if the other candidates would do likewise, of retiring in their favor and saving the cost of an election. If this could not be done he would stay in the field and he proposed that the defeated candidates pay their share of the election expenses and save this much for the town.

H. M. Deroche said they had done him the honor of nominating a lady against him and if she would consent to take the position, she could have it, as he would not oppose her. He spoke strongly against introducing politics into municipal affairs, and said that in school matters it was not a matter of dollars and cents but the question of immortal souls they were dealing with. He believed we had as good a Collegiate Institute as there was in the Province, and he strongly deprecated the idea of cutting down the staff of teachers.

Wm. Templeton said he was no speaker but that Mr. Deroche fully expressed his views. He wished Mr. Herrington was present to hear his eloquent address. He believed in maintaining first class schools Mr. Herrington killed everything he espoused and would kill the school if he got an opportunity.

Miles S. Plumley said he was not brought out by a clique as was insinuated by Mr. Templeton. He would do his best if elected to promote the interests of the school, and would [illegible] pretence of bluffy.

In the deputy reeveship it was owing to a misunderstanding that E. A. Sills was allowed to be elected by acclamation. S. J. Miller was nominated, but unfortunately there was no seconder to his nomination, and before this oversight was discovered the time for receiving nominations had expired. We understand that Mr. Miller intends securing legal advice on the matter. In the matter of councillors a change is much needed in North Fredericksburgh. The old councillors, Herman Huffman, Chas. Lloyd and George Parks, have said that they have done their best. Under their administration the rate of assessment has jumped up from 4½ to 6¾ mills on the dollar. The new aspirants, Levi F. Moore, Jacob Vanalstine and Allan Wagar are all capable men and they claim that they can manage the affairs of the township in a more economical manner. Why not give them an opportunity. The old council say they can do no better, the new men say they can, and will, do better.

Probably few travelers have any adequate idea of the cost of running trains. The cost may differ, and doubtless does differ greatly with the varying conditions, but the recently published figures of one of the extensive Western systems are instructive. The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway, operating 6,147 miles of road, has made public an analysis of expenses per revenue train mile run for the past two years, the total miles run being 31,750,418 in 1893, and 36,692,470 in 1894. The items include repairs of locomotives and cars, station service, train service, locomotive service, train and station supplies, fuel, oil and waste and miscellaneous expenses. The total operating expenses were 96.46 cents per revenue train mile in 1893, and 92.67 cents in 1894.

The revenue from passengers per train mile run was only 91.51 cents in 1893 and 90.32 cents in 1894, or less than cost. But there was a profit on freight service, the revenue per mile run being $1.5701 in 1893 and $1.5834 in 1894, and out of this margin between receipts and expenditures per mile has to come the return for the enormous investment in road, rolling stock, structures and their property. Stated in a general way, it costs about a dollar a mile, actual operative expenses, to run a train, without allowing any return on the cost of equipment.—Providence Journal.

HAY BAY.

Hello Mr. Editor, as Christmas is past and New Year's day speedily coming we will commence on something new we will altogether toe the mark and try to do better.

Mr. Elmore Wells, of Picton, spent a few days with his sister Mrs. D. A McCabe.

Miss Bertha Brown was the guest of Mr C. B. Sheffel. South Napanee for a few days.

Mr. and Mrs. D. A. McCabe, of this place spent their Christmas with her father Mr, Jacob Wells, of Picton.

Miss Rosa Brown, of this place, was the guest of Mr. Joseph Howe, of Westbrooke.

Mr. Edward Miller of this place, is on a visit with friends at Deseronto and Napanee we wish him success especially at the later place. Quite a number of our young people visited the tea meeting at Bethany, they said it was very good considering.

Remember the services at Sand Hill are to be held at half past two now instead of three. Come early and secure a seat.

Annual school meeting of school sec. No. 9 was held on the 24th, the business of 1894 was all completed. Miss Harris will take charge of the school for the future year.

The zero weather has fitted up the ice so they can cross it a foot now the cross bay boys will scute down the road before sunrise if they wish and say boys try and get back before daylight next time.

in their sad bereavement. Their little daughter Flossie Blanch died Monday 24 aged 11, and the funeral which was very largely attended occurred on Christmas day at 1 o'clock. Flossie although bright and active had been frail and delicate always and for this and other reasons was the pet of their home, Her illness dates only for 3 weeks, beginning with rheumatism it rapidly developed into weakness of the heart which proved fatal in spite of all the efforts that could be made.

Oh many lips are saying this,
Mid falling tears to-day,
And many hearts are acing sore,
Our darling Flossie's passed away:
We watched her fading day by day,
As they went slowiy by.
But cast far from us e'en the fear
That she could ever die.
She seemed so good, so pure, so true
To our admiring eyes,
We never dreamed this glorious fruit
Was ripening for the skies;
And when at last the death stroke came,
So swift, so sure, so true,
The hearts that held her here so fast,
Were almost broken too.
And when the storms of sorrow come
To each bereaved heart,
Let faith glance upward to the home,
Where we shall never part;
Where one awaits with loving eyes
To see her dear ones come,
As one by one we cross the flood,
And reach the heavenly home.

Happy New Year to the Napanee EXPRESS, and I would say, may its patrons increase in number day by day, Mr. Editor, while perusing the columns of your esteemed paper, I see items from various places, which have a reference no the doings of the past, but there is not a word put in from this isolated place. It seems, if Gohebydd will not cast his mite into your treasury from this locality, none else will. Now after being busy wandering here and there, at present "Home Sweet Home" I send you these few lines to be inserted into the EXPRESS if accepted by the editor.

Christmas week was very cold, there was an impression on our minds that winter for sure had come at last, but at present it is much milder many were the complaints for the fingers and toes, and the whole system as if paralyzed by the extremity of the cold.

It seems by the report that a very pleasant time was spent by the young people and some of the old of this vicinity on the eve of the 21st ult. at the school house Sec. No. 11, when a very lively programme, consisting of music, recitations, dialogues, &c, was rendered by the concert, to the great amusement of the crowd present. It was so good that there is a probability of having another entertainment of the same kind before long in the same place. There should be no weariness in doing good. Persist and receive. It is anticipated that the next entertainment will surpass the recent one.

It is reported that a respected young man from this neighborhood on Christmas day was united in marriage to a Miss Parker, near Mountain Grove. We wish the young couple a success through the journey of life.

The baby boy of Mr. and Mrs. D. Detlor is very sick with conjestion of the lungs. We hope that their prospect will not be blighted, Yet may it be said "Thy will be done."

A great battle is continually going on in the human system. The demon of impure blood strives to gain victory over the constitution, to ruin health, to drag victims to the grave. Mr. and Mrs. F. Phippen have returned to Brockville after spending Christmas at his parents.

Mr. T. Sloan is improving nicely. We hope to see him out soon.

It is rumored that Hugh is getting the better of Ben. Be careful Hugh perhaps the old gray will beat the little bay yet.

Mr. N. Preston has taken the contract for taking care of the brick church. He is capable of holding that office.

Mr. W. Wright spent a few days in rince Edward County.

Rumor says a wedding soon, eh Will.

I hear there are not so many boys around since the evaporator closed. Never mind boys it will start up again in the spring.

Winter is here again and we hear the old familiar jingle of the sleigh bells. We also hear one of our young ladies singing.

Oh what fun it is to ride
With Tom and his little grey.'

Mr. Hugh Hill, champion Horse trainer is busily engaged breaking colts. He understands the business.

Mr. Richard Bristow has traded his old pacer Sandy for a little trotter who can even beat Sandy, and now he sings, Sandy I'm glad your gone, You are not worth your hide, I broke three long lashed whips on you and a good fence rail beside.

A number of Physiogs passed through here on New Year's eve. They were a jolly crowd and behaved first-class. It it reported they lost a pair of pants. We hope it will be recovered.

MR. SILLS' PROPOSITION.

To the editor of The Express.

Napanee Jan. 3: Dear Sir,—I have been declared by the Returning Officer elected Deputy Reeve of North Fredericksburg by acclamation. Mr. Samuel Miller was proposed for the office but the proposition not having been seconded, the clerk after the time elapsed for receiving nominations declined to accept Mr. Miller as a candidate and declared me elected. I exceedingly regretted this, as I am always desirous of winning my seat and feel confident I could have defeated Mr. Miller. I offered Mr. Miller and his friends that I would take legal advice on the matter and if on that advice the clerk could legally place Mr. Miller's name on the ballot I would consent to his doing so, and go to the people.

Now if Mr. Miller and his friends are still dissatisfied, on his receiving or obtaining a requisition signed by fifty ratepayers in the township, whose aggregate taxes amount to five hundred dollars, asking him to contest the seat with me, I am willing to resign and enter into a contest with him provided he will agree that the expenses of the election shall be borne by the unsuccessful candidate. Awaiting Mr. Miller's decision, I remain

Yours, etc., E. A. SILLS,
Deputy Reeve N Fredericksburg.

The advice obtained by Mr. Sills from H. M. Deroche, Esq., and W. G. Wilson, Esq., is to the effect that there being no seconder to Mr. Miller's nomination, the same is of no effect.

PLAIN FACTS FOR FARMERS.

The great Wilkins Micawber never secured what he waited for till he ventured out in the world and turned it up for himself. Wishing you a prosperous new year, while it may be a pretty sentiment, will not bring prosperity, and consoling yourself that things might be worse will not mend existing conditions. For fifteen years the farmers of Canada have tilled and toiled under the National Policy patiently waiting for something to turn up. When that past master of ficton, Sir Charles Tupper, departed in search of fresh fields and pastures new, he left behind him a parting gift to the farmers in the shape of a promise that if they would only return Conservative members to power, he would see that they got a market for their products. Well, they returned Conservatives to power, and what has been the result? Why, the market has been taken away from them. Instead of getting a market for their products, they have had the market for their products taken away from them. Instead of getting a market for their products, they have had the market for their products taken away from them. Instead of getting a market for their products, they have had the market for their products words and roseate hues the benefits that were to accrue to them by the adoption of this great National Panacea they went wild with enthusiasm, and when the Liberal leaders undertook to point out how utterly fatal any protective system must be to liberty and to honest and to economical government they were frowned down as croakers who had no faith in the future of their country.

Hon. Alexander McKenzie repeatedly warned the farmers of Canada of the dangers of this system and time has verified his prophecies. Instead of the tall chimneys that were to loom up in every four acre plot in this broad Dominion, mills lie dormant, and the machinery either removed or long since rusted and gone to decay. The great home market that this wonderful Policy was to produce has never materialized, and instead of the population being augmented the country has not, during the last ten years, retained its natural increase. There is no need to go away from home for an illustration of this. Contrast Napanee of to-day with the Napanee of twelve or fifteen years ago and how strange the contrast seems.

When Sir Charles Tupper said in 1878 that the Tory Government would govern the country for less than that raised in taxes by the McKenzie Government his words were quite in common with the other statements made by him. The revenue collected from the people to defray the cost of Liberal Government was only $22,375,001, while it increased to $38,158,608 in 1893 under Tory misrule, or an increase in expenditure amounting to about the total value of the whole of our export of cheese in 1893. While the farmers lands have depreciated in value and their incomes have been reduced under this pernicious National Policy, the public debt has been steadily piled up, until it now reaches the figure of $62.20 per head on every man woman and child in the Dominion, or an increase of 83 per cent in 16 years. Had the resources and wealth of the country correspondingly developed there might be found some justification for so heavily increasing the taxes, but unfortunately neither does increased population nor the development of the resources and wealth of the country warrant any such increased taxation. While the taxes increased 70 per cent during the past 15 years, the increase in population was only a fraction over 13 per cent. While taxes increased 70 per cent, expenditures increased only 56 per cent, and the question may well be asked why the unnecesscesary bleeding of the taxpayer? To what use was this surplus of $15,496,460 of reuenue over expenditure applied? When we for a moment remember, however, the recent disclosures brought out in the McGreevy-Connolly trial, the Curran bridge scandal, etc., how the money was passed out of the treasury chest to dishonest contractors and political wire-pullers, to be returned through this channel to the credit of the Government's election fund, little discrepancies like these do not provoke surprise.

With Mackenzie Bowell as Premier the Tories are wedded to the National Policy. Tory organs are just now lauding the protection afforded to the farmer, by the National Policy, in the home market. While this species of argument went down in the prehistoric days of the N. P. intelligent farmers know just how much weight to place in them now. D'Alton McCarthy, one of the framers of the N.P. and who but for the stand taken by him might have been Premier to-day, utterly repudiated the National Policy at Picton the other day. He is a thinking man, not bound to any party and his testimony should bear weight. Col. O'Brien, the man from Shanty Bay and an old N. P. man, is fighting Raising poultry for meat or eggs, is a trade which requires apprenticeship and experience to make a profit from, not taking into account a living for one's self and family. To be sure there are thousands of small flocks in the yards of mechanics, clerks, bankers and clergymen, from which, if no money profit is realized, a large profit in pleasure and recreation is secured. As a rule a small flock will pay a better profit than a large one, proportionately, for the reason that the waste from the kitchen—bread, meat and vegetables—from an ordinary sized family will nearly feed a flock of a dozen, while it would be so small an item, in a flock large enough to make a living from, that its benefit would be hardly felt. The small flock will also have better care in various ways. The house can be kept in the best sanitary condition, and the roof and sides proof against rain and wind; if a fowl is ailing it is quickly discovered, the cause found, and the remedy applied. If the number of eggs suddenly falls off, the reason for it is sought for, and change made in feed or management to right the wrong. It is this personal care and oversight, acquaintance with each bird of the flock, that makes the small flock pay better than the large one.

If it were possible to give flocks of one hundred or one thousand the same care and attention that is given to one, there is no reason why equal returns should not be realized. Peculiar qualities are needed by those who go into poultry raising with a view to make it a life business. One, and the most important is love for the work, a willingness to work day and night, a thorough system that no detail may be neglected, that every part of everyday's duties shall be attended to promptly and at the proper time. A little neglect in one part today, another in some other part to-morrow, will turn certain success to as certain failure. The location is not the most important factorh, though if one can choose it, it will add materially to the chances for success as well as to the amount of profit. To be near a good market is very desirable, but in these days of quick transportation, a place, specially suitable, is better, even if one hundred miles from market, than one unsuitable and only ten miles away. Some of the largest and most successful market poultrymen send poultry and eggs more than two hundred miles and the birds killed one afternoon are in market early next morning.

To be successful one must be something of a merchant as well as a poultryman, and must keep posted on the markets for what he buys as well as for what he sells. Any turn that enables him to save on his feed bill, is so much profit made at the start. It is often possible to get better prices in one market than in another, and he should know it and take advantage of it. In the management of the flock, especially the feeding, a sharp eye should be kept; a little waste in each feed trough, will amount to many dollars in the course of a year. A good crop of lice in any house will end the egg crop, and all hope of profit from that house. A hen with the roup, not taken care of, will spread the disease to the others, and the profit and the fowls vanish together. Invalids and lazy people should never attempt to go into the poultry business with the expectation of making it a means of livelihood.—American Agriculturist.

Salaries of Clergymen.

Mr. H. K. Carroll, an English writer, describes the rates at which preachers are paid in the United States of America. Protestant Episcopal bishops draw the highest salaries, running from £600, with £60 traveling expenses, to £2500. There is only one bishop who draws as much as this; £1000 is the usual salary of an Episcopal bishop. The Methodist Episcopal bishop receives £600, and £300 for house rent and traveling expenses. Catholic bishops vary from £600 to £1000; the archbishops receive £2000 a year. For parsons, the Methodist's average salary is £200, although in the cities it ranges from £500 downwards. The Congregationalists have an average of £200, the highest salary in the denomination being four stipends of £2000 each. The Presbyterian is a little higher; there are eight or ten paid £2000, six of which are in New York, and one receives £3000. No Baptist, with one exception, receives more than £1200.

Cape May one day last week by Harry Lemman. Mr. Lemman was fishing and caught it in his net. The sea hare was unknown to the fishermen of the locality, who thought it belonged to the cuttlefish family, as it emitted from a sac on the under side fluid of a red and black color. The specimen which weighs about two and a half pounds, has been presented to the Academy of Natural Science, and will be exhibited in a live state in the museum for a few days for the benefit of visitors.

A member of the academy has furnished the following discription of the specimen: Aphysia, or as it is commonly called, the sea hare, is a mollusk allied to the snails and slugs, but living in the sea and feeding on marine vegetation. Its shell is rudimentary and internal the body being protected by a flesh lobe or flap on each side. The head has four tentacles. The eyes are very small. Species of aphysia have been found in Bermuda and Florida, but never before on the Jersey coast. This specimen, therefore, extends the range about 1,000 miles. In ancient times aphysia was supposed to be poisonous, and to cause baldness to anyone handling them, but they are now known to be perfectly harmless.—From The Philadelphia Public Ledger.

KITE FLYING.

Difficulties in Sending a Kite to Great Altitudes.

It is one of the most difficult undertakings imaginable to even approximately estimate the height of a kite above the earth. This is on account of the fact that objects floating in the air seem to be farther away than they really are. It may be safely said that 1,800 feet is the maximum altitude that can possibly be attained by a single kite. A kite flying at the height mentioned will appear, even to a casual observer, to be nearly, if not quite half a mile above the surface of the earth, but a careful measurement of the string and its angle will quickly prove that it could not have been more than a fourth of a mile above the ground.

Ordinarily a kite will go no higher, even if more string be paid out; this is because the wind depresses the cord and causes the kite really to recede when it appears to rise. It has been said that it is possible to arrange several kites in such a manner that they will reach a higher altitude than it is possible to attain with a single kite. In this manner, where three, four or even a dozen kites have been used, remarkable heights have been reached. When more than one kite is used, only the main one is attached to the end of the string, the others being attached along the main line at an average distance of about 12 feet apart.

Hinkleman, who made experiments at Budapest, and Irison and Watson, whose investigations under the Russian Academy of Sciences were carried on at Edeenea, Finland, report curious results. Where single kites could be forced up into the atmosphere to a

A Monstrous Baby.

Think of a baby a year and four weeks old which weighs 52 pounds! Such a one belongs to Mrs. R. H. Bailey, of Washington. The parents of the child are not unusually large. The father's weight is 180 pounds. He is tall and not corpulent. The mother weighs 164 pounds. She is well formed and does not give one the impression of being what is called a stout woman. Mr. and Mrs. Bailey have one other child—a boy six years old, who is not remarkable for his size. The baby weighed at birth about 11 pounds. At six months she weighed 35 pounds. It was then that her remarkable size was first noticed and that she was first weighed. At seven months she had gained five pounds. At eight months she weighed 43½ pounds. During her ninth month she cut four teeth, and neither lost nor gained in flesh. At 10 months the child weighed 45 pounds; at 11 months, 46½, and at 12 months, 50. She has already cut 12 teeth. She has never been fed on prepared foods, has received nourishment wholly from the breast, and has not yet been weaned. The little girl is active and healthy. She moves about the floor with rapidity, and already she has begun to talk.

Cleaning St. Paul's.

Every few years somebody raises the question whether St. Paul's Cathedral in London ought not to be cleaned from the soot with which it is encrusted, and restored to something like its primitive whiteness. Some time ago an experiment of the sort was made on one of the porticos, which forthwith assumed a mottled or piebald appearance. Now the matter has come up for discussion again, and the following interesting point is made in a letter to The Times by a well-known architect: "I have had the opportunity, when examining some of our London stone-faced churches, of removing the coat of dirt with a view of seeing the condition of the stone under it, and have found it to be perfect. The casing of dirt appeared to be made chiefly of road dust, which had adhered to the stone (only the outer coat of all being grey black). All the deleterious chemicals must have gone out of the lower layer, so that the dirt was a perfect protection. If it were all cleaned off, the stone would be subjected to the strong chemicals in our London atmosphere. It must be remembered that this dirt only adheres to the parts which are not completely washed by the rain, and that it is just these parts, therefore, which are in most need of protection. It at some future time the atmosphere of London should be as pure as the atmosphere of the country is now, it might be wise to act on the suggestion, but until that time comes I sincerely trust that no such experiment will be tried."

Good Words for Americans.

Take them as a whole, the Americans are the kindliest race on the face of the earth. In spite of their eagerness, their push their desire to be in the front rank at all times and all seasons, the true American seldom fails in kindness. He wants badly to prevent anyone getting ahead of him mentally, physically, and morally, but his competitors falls in the struggle he will make untold sacrifice to help him up. The rule in American business is pure cut-throat competition carried to its logical conclusion. You are expected to press and push every point as far as it possible be pushed and pressed, and no one is expected to consider whether, in making a commercial coup, you will not ruin Brown, Jones and Robinson. The moment, however, that Brown, Jones or Robinson actually goes under he is treated with the utmost generosity and consideration.

The hand which struck him down is instantly stretched forth to help him, and as much care and trouble are used to put him on his feet again as were originally employed to knock him off them. In social intercourse this kindness and sunniness are specially attractive. The American will take infinite pains to make the merest stranger happy. He is courteous and pleasant-spoken, not like the Frenchman, from convention, but from the sense of pleasure which his instinctive optimism teaches him to diffuse. His optimism has even proved strong enough to break down the shyness which naturally belongs to the English race. One sees, no doubt, survivals of it in the American; but in most cases the sense that all is for the best in the best possible of worlds has mastered it altogether.—London Spectator.

ARD'S LINIMENT.

Weather and the Mind.

The psychology of the weather is suggested by Dr. T. D. Crothers as a promising subject for study. He says, in Science: Very few persons recognized the sources of error that come directly from atmospheric conditions on experimenters and observers and others. In my own case I have been amazed at the faulty deductions and misconceptions which were made in damp, foggy weather, or on days in which the air was charged with electricity and thunderstorms were impending. What seemed clear to me at these times appeared later to be filled with error. An actuary in a large insurance company is obliged to stop work at such times, finding that he makes so many mistakes, which he is only conscous of later, that his work is useless. In a large factory from 10 to 20 per cent, less work is brought out on damp days and days of threatening storm. The superintendent, in receiving orders to be delivered at a certain time, takes this factor into calculation."

Compressed Air For Car Cleaning.

Railroad car cleaning by compressed air is one of the latest developments of compressed air application, of which, in late years, there has been almost endless multiplication. Attention was drawn to it recently in a report of a committee of the Master Car Builders' Association detailing the growing use of compressed air in car shops and yards, and illustrating various forms of pneumatic hoists, pumps and other labor-saving apparatus for railroad service. Not the least interesting among these were the dusting nozzles, which in three instances at least—on the West Shore, the Erie and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific lines—have been put to use with such good results that they would seem to promise the early relegation to the railroad curio scrap heap of the conventional rattan beater and brush. These compressed air dusters, as shown by tests made by the committee, effect a decided saving in time in cleaning car cushions, the average time consumed by two men, one operating one of the nozzles and the other handling the seats, in removing the dust from plush and springs of 200 seats, cleaning them perfectly, being from 27 to 33 seconds for each seat. The air used in these tests was supplied from a reservoir at a pressure of from 60 to 90 pounds per square inch. Another test at cleaning by hand in the usual way, with beaters and brushes, showed the time necessary for each seat to vary from three to four minutes, the air dusters thus effecting a time saving of about 85 per cent.—Cassier's Magazine.

Minard's Liniment is the Hair Restorer.

"No, William," said Mary Doublefare, gently, yet with a note of unmistakable firmness in her voice, "it is useless for you to urge me. While you were in this precinct I learned to respect you for your many good qualities and I shall always hold you in high esteem, but I do not love you, and although I believe that you have a golden future before you—a future which any young girl ought to be proud to share I cannot marry you. Where my hand goes my heart must go to."

"One word more," said William Cinch the dashing and accomplished wardman of the merriest precinct in the town, "before the curtain is rung down forever on the little drama, or comedy, in which we have been the principal actors. Tell me, I implore you, has any other man come between us? I have heard it said more than once that Walter Dealbrace was your devoted admirer, and besides"—and here his voice grew hard and cold—"it's only last week that I seen you talking in a doorway with Rupert Flimflam."

The young girl's lip curled contemptuously as she made answer: "Mr. Dealbrace will have to do something to change his luck before he presumes to say anything about love to me. It is not likely that we will meet again for some time."

"What! Have you parted forever?" cried the detective eagerly.

CHARMED BY RUPERT FLIMFLAM.

"We have," rejoined the maiden icily, "unless he happens to bring back those four bones I let him have a month ago. As for Rupert Flimflam," she continued, carelessly, with no trace of contempt or bitterness in her voice, "my feelings toward him are only those which any lady might entertain toward a gentleman whom she had met but three times in her life, once at the Gold Brick Coterie's moonlight, and twice, casually, in doorways.

"I will be frank with you, William, however, and say that I have been strongly attracted by Mr. Flimflam, not so much on account of the way in which he has been putting out those new fives, but because of his high sense of honor and engaging personality as well.

"But it is scarcely probable," she continued, "that Mr. Flimflam, with his golden prospects, will deem it worth his while to pay court to the daughter of poor old Jack Doublefare, for as you well know, cab driving in the old Tenderloin is by no means what it was before these reformers, as they are called, ruined the precinct and reduced so many of us to beggary."

"Ah! Mary," exclaimed the young ward man, sympathetically, "it breaks my heart to think of you and your father, now that the Tenderloin is dried up, and there's no elephant for the jays to see. This winter is going to be an easy one for the victims, though they won't appreciate their blessings, but a very cold one for the smart ones, and between you and me this very Tenderloin, where you've been born and brought up, ain't going to be much warmer than the North Pole! Think of all this, Mary, ere you refuse the home which I offer to you both."

At this allusion to her father, once the wealthiest night-hawk in the precinct, but now a gray-haired, poverty-stricken man, every trace of coldness and haughty pride disappeared from Mary Doublefare's face, and a big tear coursed down her cheek as she exclaimed, in broken accents:

MEMORIES OF GOOD OLD TIMES.

"William—Mr. Cinch—do not, I implore you, speak of that. My poor, dear father"—and burying her head in her hands she wept bitterly.

"Alas!" she said presently. "The future is indeed dark before us, and I can scarcely restrain my grief when I contrast our bitter poverty of to-day with the affluence which we enjoyed but a few short years ago when good, kind Capt. Fatwadd ruled in the precinct and free trade and protection went hand in hand.

"There was scarcely a moaning then when dear papa did not come home after his night's work with diamond pins and watches and rolls of bills that he had found on his fares, and we were of Fleming Hall, and by Algernon Sidney was hardly a sober one to be found among them all. I know but little of political economy or sociology, William, I have not read much of John Stuart Mill or Herbert Spencer, but surely

THE LOVERS.

Heaven never sent a more precious gift to one of its well beloved precincts than a plentiful crop of drunks. Why, they are the very life of trade of every sort.

"It is the drunks who keep on buying more drinks, who play the wheel on a system, who keep on opening the same bottle of wine until the waiter brings in a check for $65, who hire cabs by the hour and who go to sleep in them—in short, the drunks are to a community all that the rain, the fertilizer and the seed are to the soil which the farmer tills. Did it ever occur to you, William, that the manna which fell in the desert was simply so many drunks?"

"I confess," said William, "that that is to me a new interpretation of the Scriptures. But why do you think so?"

GRIEVES FOR HER POOR OLD FATHER.

"Well," replied the young girl thoughtfully, "it always fell at night and then, you know the children of Israel subsisted on it for so many years, but I fear there will be but little manna in this part of the town for many a long day. Ah, why do these cruel reformers keep all the tipplers away from the precinct in which they used to be so happy?

"I am sure that if they only knew how terribly poor papa has suffered even their hard hearts would be touched. His cough has been very bad of late. He has been accustomed all his life to the bracing night air, and when he attempted to drive his cab about in the daytime the sunshine proved too much for him, and he caught cold, which settled on his lungs, and now, although the doctor has forbidden him to go out until after dark, he finds that he is sensitive to even the moonlight, and he has suffered terribly during the clear nights we have had lately.

"But it is useless for us to discuss the matter further. You must leave me now, William, and I sincerely hope that you will find someone who will make you very, very happy. Good-by, and thank you for all the kindness you have shown me."

And with these words in his ears the stalwart young wardman walked away, sorrowfully, and with bowed head.

THE VILLAGE OF TENDERLOIN.

A cold, dreary, rainy autumnal night. The whole town seems weight-down with the gloom and wretchedness of the soggy atmosphere, but nowhere is the desolation so awful and depressing, and at the same time so pathetic, as in the deserted village called the Tenderloin.

Here the chill wind sweeps in moaning gusts through streets whose grave-like silence only serves as a reminder of those joyous nights of old, when they resounded to the poping of champagne corks, the rattle of ivory chips, the cheerful hiss of the electric light, the melody from a score of pianos and the shrill cry of the nighthawk as he fell upon his prey.

At a 6th avenue corner stands a hack whose forlorn and dilapidated appearance is in perfect accord with the deserted precinct in which it has been for two decades a familiar object. The and gray—are as motionless as if they were posing in a living picture, and as indifferent to the elements as if they were carved out of stone.

The equipage attracts the attention of William Cinch, who has come up town from his own happy, prosperous precinct in company with a gentleman of rural aspect, who wears long gray whiskers and has sawdust sprinkled over his clothes. It is apparent to every Tenderloiner who notices the pair that the bucolic gentleman is a "come-back" whom William, the ever alert and faithful public servant, is chasing out of town for being a counterfeiter, and as the unfortunate man starts for the Pavonia ferry the wardman fixes his eyes upon the old hack driver and murmurs compassionately.

"Poor old Jack Doublefare! I can remember the time when hardly a week went by without some victim being added up in that old cab to find that he was and and pin and roll had been taken while he was asleep. He always did a clean job of it, did old Jack. But he's only a wreck of what he was."

VISIONS OF THE HAPPY PAST.

Then, as he strolled slowly and dejectedly through the rain, his thoughts turned to gentle Mary Doublefare, whom he had not seen since that memorable evening, three months before, when she had definitely and finally refused his proffered hand.

He thought of her with infinite sadness and longing, but without a trace of bitterness, remembering the gracious, innocent smile with which she used to greet him and the delight that used to illuminate her sweet face when he brought her the choicest fruits that could be found on any stand that he permitted to obstruct the sidewalk in his precinct, or placed in her hand some trinket that had served as a souvenir in a wealthy family.

And he remembered, too, how they used to sit side by side on the sofa in her little parlor and merrily invent names to fit the initials which adorned graven on his simple gifts, and then search the "Lost and Stolen" columns to see if there was any reference to them there.

Ah! those were happy days, and now he wonders if Mary's heart were still her own to bestow upon some fortunate suitor. His face hardened as he thought of Rupert Flimflam, nimble of finger and persuasive of tongue—just the man to enchain the fancy of a high spirited, romantic and altogether "fly" young girl.

DEALBRACE NO LONGER A RIVAL.

And Walter Dealbrace—he of the clean cut profile and cold gray eye—but no, Walter was in no condition now to pay his addresses to any woman brought up amid the luxurious surroundings to which, as the daughter of one of the wealthiest of the Tenderloin's old time nighthawks, she had been accustomed from the moment of her birth until that of the destruction of the precinct. Time was when Walter dressed in the height of fashion, and when his high-bred, sensitive nature recoiled from contact with anything but blue chips. But now he was sadly changed.

William had seen him but once in six months. It was on the night when he ten upon her heart with a dead, leaden weight, and she would have given the world for a chance to see, if but for a single moment, the handsome young official whom she had at last learned to love.

But how to accomplish this? Just at this moment his eyes fell upon "Marcella," which she had just finished, and in a moment she had reached a decision.

"Papa," she said, that evening, as the old cabman was starting out for his night's work, "if you have that fellow again for a fare I want you to say to him, just as if you were giving him a jolly: 'I've got a daughter at home who's dead gone on you and think's you'd make a splendid husband.' Just say that to him, papa, and let me know what answer he gives you."

The old man promised and kept his word.

AND SO THEY WERE MARRIED.

The rest of this little tale may be told in a few words. William Cinch heard the message and hastened to respond. Mary Doublefare met him on the threshold and within a very short time the compact had been sealed which bound them togeher for life.

Christmas time found the loving couple established in a house of their own in the beautiful precinct over which their former friend, Capt. Fatwadd, ruled with a benign sway. As for old Jack Doublefare, he secured, through the influence of his son-in-law, the exclusive right to drive "guys" through Central Park, and his carriage is now known as the "joint on wheels," on which many a neat trick has been turned.

than four or five inches thick at the bottom. It was tall and straight, and had no branches except a few small ones at the very top.

If he had stopped climbing when barely out of reach of the hogs, which were swarming below him, he would have been safe. But in his excitement he went higher and higher, until the sapling bent over and allowed him to hang head downward, but a few feet above the ground.

With wild eyes the terrified boy looked down at the hogs, some of which were jumping up and doing their best to get to him. His arms and legs were locked around his slender support with desperate tightness, for if his hold gave way he realized that he would fall head first among the fierce swine.

"Go back, Tom, go back!" shouted Johnny from his perch of safety. "You're climbing too high. Go back, and the tree will straighten up with you."

But to go back was just what poor Tom could not do. With all his boyish accomplishments, he had never learned to climb a tree feet foremost.

Johnny and Claude were watching him anxiously, and were much alarmed at his dangerous position. They did not know at what moment the sapling might break; or if that did not happen, how soon Tom's hold might give way. In either case he would be precipitated among the hogs and torn to pieces.

Tom was too badly scared to do more than hold on for dear life. Claude was not having an easy time on his grape vine, and had all he could do to take care of himself. Johnny having a secure and comfortable place of refuge, felt that he ought to try to relieve his less fortunate friend.

"Hang on, Tom!" he called, by way of encouragement. "Maybe I can get 'em away from you. If I do, you let go and make for another tree."

Slipping down to the ground, he picked up a stick and ran towards the hogs. ...fore he got to them, he ...ight and threw ... waiting

The sun sank lower and lower, and at length was hidden behind the trees. Twilight came. The hogs showed signs of restlessness, but as yet none of them had gone away. The three fugitives watched them anxiously.

While they were waiting in silence, a faint squealing was heard far away down the creek.

"Something's caught a pig," Claude whispered to Tom. "What do you s'pose it is?"

"I don't know. Maybe it's a wolf and maybe it's a panther that's got it."

The hogs also heard the squealing. They could be seen listening for a few moments. Then they bristled up fiercely uttering loud, quick grunts of anger. They evidently knew that one of their kind was in distress.

Again they listened, holding their heads low and keeping perfectly still.

The squealing stopped for a moment or two, then began louder than ever.

Suddenly the whole drove, led by a big fierce-looking-boar, dashed away at full speed. They were going to the relief of the unfortunate pig.

"Now's our time," said Tom. "They're not likely to come back, I think; but I don't want to wait and see."

The three quickly climbed down from their perches and started for the camp at a lively rate.

They were afraid of running upon other hogs in the dark, and also of losing their way. But, after following for some fifteen minutes the course they believed to be the right one, they heard the sound of voices not far ahead, and, to their great relief, saw through the the trees the camp-fires blazing brightly.

Bracing Gate Posts.

A very effective method of preventing a gate from sagging so low that it will hardly shut is shown in the illustration. In selecting the material, the upright post to which the gate is swung should be of large size, strong and durable, at least a foot in diameter and more if possible. Set it deep down into the ground, big end down that it may not rot so soon and lean very slightly opposite to the gate. Tramp firmly from the bottom of the hole to the top. With two pieces of 2x4 scantling securely brace the large post, as shown in illustration, placing the braces in the form of an X. These may be secured either by bolts or large wire nails; possibly both can be used to advantage. Then after they are properly secured, make the job still more complete by running a strand of wire from the top of the second fence post to the bottom of the third, pulling this as tight as may be. This method of bracing gate posts is simple and at the same time effective, and if the work is properly done and the gates themselves securely nailed together, there need be little difficulty with sagging farm gates.

man who had paid fairly for his protection, and was fairly entitled to something for his money.

"Poor Mary!" he said to himself with a sorrowful shake of the head. "I am afraid that things are not coming her way to any fabulous extent just now, and she is too proud to accept assistance from me. If I could only help her in such a way that she would not find out that it was me who done it!"

And at that moment William Cinch stopped suddenly in his walk, stood for a moment wrapped in intense thought, then turned, and, with a low muttered "I'll do it to-night!" hurriedly retraced his steps down the avenue.

IN THE DOUBLEFARES' HOME.

The changing scenes of this little drama bring us once more to the humble home of the Doublefares. It is 6.30 in the morning and Mary has arisen early according to her invariable custom, that she may prepare breakfast for her father on his return from his night's

The travelers were on their way to Texas, through the "Nation," as the Indian Territory is called. There were a half dozen families of them. They were now in the Choctaw county, and had stopped and gone into camp for a few days.

The chief object of this delay was to give their teams, which had become much jaded, an opportunity to rest and recuperate. But, as the country abounded in game, the party had decided to take advantage of this stop to have some sport and also to obtain a supply of fresh meat, if possible.

Not more than an hour before, all the men and larger boys had taken the guns and dogs and gone out with the expectation of bringing back some turkeys, and perhaps a deer or two. The camp and teams were thus left in care of the women and children.

The three boys continued to play with the swing for some time, but at length grew tired of it. They had wanted to go with the hunting party, but had been left behind because it was thought they would be in the way.

"Say, boys," said Tom Kelly, the oldest of the group, "can't we find something else to do? I've got enough of this swinging."

"So have I. Let's play some game or other," suggested Johnny Hendricks.

"Too hot to play games," objected Tom, as he picked up a stone and threw it at a bird.

"Well, how about going in swimming?" suggested Claude Yantis, who was still sitting in the swing.

"Yes, that's the very thing! Let's do that," said Johnny.

"Where's your water? Over there?" asked Tom, laughing as he jerked his thumb toward a small ravine but a short distance east of the camp.

Tom was not slow to a Claude's grape-vine. There was no time to go further, for the hogs were coming toward him.

"Don't come up here, Tom! Don't! Don't!" cried Claude in the greatest terror. "It'll break with both of us."

But it was too late. Tom had already climbed up quite a ways, and the hogs were crowding together under him.

To the terror of both the boys, the vine, though it did not break, began to give way and let them down a few inches at a time. It was an exciting moment.

"I didn't want you to come up here. I told you it would break," said Claude, half crying from fright.

"Climb higher! Climb higher!" begged Tom, who saw himself getting in dangerous proximity to the hogs.

Claude went up a few feet farther, Tom following close behind him. Fortunately the vine, after letting them down about a yard, stopped and seemed to hold firmly.

Both of the boys felt, however, that it might give way at any moment and let them drop. In fact, that was what they expected for some minutes, and they scarcely dared to move or draw a long breath, lest the strain should be too much for their frail support.

The hogs showed no disposition to go away, but remained under the tree as if waiting for the fugitives to come down.

This the boys had not the slightest intention of doing, if they could help it.

Finding that the vines was not going to pull loose from above, Claude climbed up till he reached the first limb. Then Tom did the same, and they both felt safe.

The three now began to discuss their situation. The hogs would doubtless get tired of waiting, and go away sooner or later; but the question was when.

"Likely as not they'll hang around here all night," said Tom, looking longingly toward the camp.

"Let's yell for help," said Johnny. "Maybe somebody will hear us and by the opening of the door and the young girl was in her aged parent's arms.

"Father!" she cried with an infinite yearning in her voice, "did that same fellow turn up again and ask you to take him around and show him all the sights?"

In reply the old nighthawk took from the inner pocket of his overcoat and placed in his daughter's hand a roll of bills, a diamond pin and a handsome gold watch and chain.

"I never see such a persistent victim nor one with so many new outfits of solid stuff in all the years I've been driving hack," he remarked with something like reverence in his voice. "You'd oughter seen the other drivers racin' for him when he showed up in 6th avenue with his load aboard. Drunk? Well, I should say so. Why, what ails ye, gal?"

"Nothing, father. Only it was so cold waiting here for you," she responded quickly. But as she busied herself about the breakfast table he noticed that her face was pale, while her lips trembled, as if from some deep emotion.

CINCH'S SCHEME DISCOVERED.

That afternoon, while the white-haired hack-driver was sleeping noisily in the adjoining room, Mary Doubletare sat in a rocking chair by the window holding in her hand a simple cluster, now wet with her tears. She wondered why it was that she did not suspect from the very first the identity of the stranger who for three successive nights had entered her father's cab, artfully disguised as an inebriated Syracuse merchant and permitted himself to be shorn of money, watch and jewels under the pretence of being taken to see the elephant.

Had it not been for that cluster pin, which she had seen him wear so many, many times, she would never have suspected that it was to William Cinch, the rejected lover that they owed their recent burst of good fortune. But the pin had told the story, and the watch—the gift of a pawn-broker—she also recalled, for William had proudly shown her the very day after the big bur-

As for the inexhaustible fountain of good stuff was none other than the noble, high minded wardman, whose hand she had refused, kindly, it is true, but none the less firmly. With what exquisite tact and delicacy had he sought to do her and her father a kindness! Could anything have been better calculated to win a woman's love and admiration than a generosity which, while accomplishing its purpose, avoided all appearance of charity?

And how much good it had done her father—the excitement of following once more his old calling! Never since the passing of the old precinct had her sire seemed so vigorous and hearty, so full of hope for the future and enjoyment of the present as he had since his first meeting with the mysterious victim, who always felt sound asleep in the cab and never seemed to know or care what happened to him.

MISS DOUBLEFARE'S GRATITUDE.

And now, with her tears falling swiftly on the cluster pin and blotting out the inscription—"Wentworth from Uncle Jabez"—in the inside of the watch, poor Mary Doubleface realized the true worth of the deathless love which this noble wardman had placed at her feet, and which she had spurned. If she could but see him for a moment, if only to thank him—to tell him, before they parted forever, that she knew all that he had done for her and that she appreciated the exquisite tact with which he had performed what was, after all, an act of simple charity.

And then the awful fear that perhaps he had found solace for his wounded heart came upon her with crushing force. She had heard since their last meeting, that he had become attentive to Susan Knockout, the daughter of the celebrated chemist, Percival Knockout, well known as a re-plater of gold bricks and the discoverer of the famous elixir of sleep, called in his honor "knockout drops."

She had paid but little heed to that rumor at the time, knowing that as wardman of his precinct it was but natural for him to have business dealings with Susan's father which might occasion frequent visits to the chemist's house. But now the thought of Susan

"Pshaw—no! that ain't deep enough to swim a chicken," replied Claude. "Down yonder's the place." He pointed towards the south. "Will Hendricks was down there hunting this morning, and I heard him say he ran across a good sized creek."

"Did he? Then I'm willing," agreed Tom. "Let's look about the horses first, and then we'll strike out and see what we can find."

The horses were scattered around the camp, some loose and some tied to trees of bushes with long ropes. They were found to be all right, and the three boys set out through the woods toward where the creek was supposed to be.

They walked nearly a mile through scattering timber, the trees being far enough apart for a rank growth of prairie grass to cover the ground. Then the party went down into a bottom, and found themselves in a dense forest of tall timber.

They soon came to the creek, which contained plenty of water. But the banks were so steep that getting in and out would be troublesome, so they went further down in search of a more convenient place.

As they wandered along carelessly, laughing and joking, they were startled by a chorus of loud grunts. A few yards ahead of them they saw a drove of hogs, twenty or thirty in number, and of all ages and sizes, coming up the creek bank.

No sooner had the animals caught sight of the boys than they crowded together and stood as if at bay.

Tom uttered a whoop.

"Just look, boys!" he cried. "Did you ever see such a lot of hazel splitters? My how ugly they are! What breed do you s'pose they belong to?"

"I guess they must be the Choctaw berkshires," answered Johnny, at which they all laughed.

"Just see what long legs they've got," said Claude. "They'd make fine racehogs, wouldn't they?"

"That's what they would," replied Tom. "They can run mighty fast."

The hogs were certainly peculiar in appearance. They were fierce-looking creatures, tall and gaunt, with long noses and protruding tusks. They could run like deer when necessary, and would fight like tigers if they felt so disposed.

On taking possession of the country, fifty or sixty years before, the Choctaws had brought hogs with them. These, turned loose in the forest and left to shift for themselves, had multiplied and become wild. In a short time they ceased to be looked upon as the property of any particular individual, but belonged, like the game, to any man who could capture or kill them.

They subsisted on roots, nuts, acorns, and anything else of an edible character that came in their way. With their long noses they could tear up the hardest ground. From protecting themselves from men and beasts of prey, they had developed great running and fighting powers, but had lost the capacity for taking on much flesh.

The drove stood motionless waiting to see if they were to be attacked. They snapped their jaws together warningly. Their coarse, wiry bristles stood upright, adding to the ferocity of their appearance.

Had the boys known more of the character of these hogs, they would have let them alone. But, instead of doing that, Tom called out:

"Come on, boys! Let's see 'em skedaddle."

And the three made a rush toward the drove, slapping their hands and shouting at the top of their voices.

Instead of running away, the hogs made a sudden charge, all together.

Instantly the boys wheeled around, and each of them started for a tree—the first climable one he could find.

The most of the trees near by were large. Johnny was fortunate enough to find one of small size, and up he scrambled, faster, doubtless, than he had ever climbed before. In a few moments he was safely perched in a fork, several feet out of reach of the hogs.

Looking around, to learn how his companions had fared, he saw that Claude had climbed a grape-vine which ran up the side of a large burr-oak. He, too, was high enough to be safe, but was in danger of slipping down if he relaxed his hold on the vine.

Tom had been less fortunate. His come and run 'em away."

As there was nothing better to do, they called as loud as they could. Each took his turn at shouting, and kept it up till his throat was sore.

But the camp was out of hearing, and there was probably no house of white man or Indian in the vicinity.

By this time the sun was getting low, and the boys were becoming impatient.

"Looks a good deal as if the long-legged, ugly things will make us roost up here all night," said Johnny fretfully.

"It does look that way," admitted Claude. "I'll tell you, boys. Let's throw sticks at 'em."

So they broke off all the dead limbs in reach, and threw them down at the hogs. The animals became excited and angry, but manifested no intention of leaving.

"Now, I'll tell you my way of getting rid of 'em," said Tom. "Let's keep just as still as mice—not talk, nor move, nor do anything to make a noise. Then I guess they'll soon forget we're up here. They won't see us, because they don't seem to be looking up."

This suggestion was acted upon. The three boys remained as still as they could, and waited to see what the result would be.

The hogs moved about under the trees, grunting and rooting in the leaves and loose earth.

Obituary.

OLIVE ETHEL THOMPSON,

Second daughter of J. L. Thompson, passed peacefully away to the realms above, on Dec. 29th, at half past ten. She was a very active child and was loved by all who knew her, especially by her schoolmates, who will be much grieved to hear of her sad departure. Olive was taken ill on Sunday and suffered greatly with inflamation of the lungs. Much sympathy is felt for the bereaved parents and friends, who stood by her side when she left, with a smile on her angel face, to enjoy a happy happy home with all who have gone before.

In this world of care and pain
Lord Thou wouldst no longer leave it
To the sunny heavenly plain
Thou dost now with joy receive it.
Clothed in robes of spotless white
Now it dwells with Thee in light.
Ah Lord Jesus grant that we
Where it lived will soon be living
And the lovely pastures see
That its heavenly food are giving,
Then the gain of death we prove Though Thou take what most we love

we have received during the past year, and we trust by strict and careful attention to business to merit continuance of the same. Our motto for 1895 will be: "A pleased customer will call again. Committed Suicide.

A sad case of suicide occurred at Bath on Monday, Allen Aylesworth, as strong and healthy a looking man as might be seen in many miles and who came of a very highly respected family, was found suspended from a beam in his own barn. The deceased was subject to temporary fits of insanity and it is supposed that during one of these he committed the rash deed. William Thurston, who works Mr. Aylesworth's farm, having occasion to go to the barn at noon to feed his cattle found the lifeless body of the young man hanging. He at once called the neighbors who removed the body to his own home. Deceased was about thirty years of age and was a son of the late P. P. Aylesworth.

Address and Presentation.

A pleasant incident took place on Saturday afternoon last, the occasion being the presentation of an address, accompanied by a cane, to Mr. W. H. Boyle by his employees. The address, expressive of their sense of the kindly relations which always exist between them, together with the handsome ebony gold-headed cane inscribed in commemoration of the occasion, bore evidence of the esteem in which he is held by his employees. Mr. Boyle responded briefly thanking them for their kindness and goodwishes, and assuring them that the cane would recall to him many pleasant remembrances when he would have given up the cares of business. Mr. Boyle is to be congratulated on this evidence of unity so seldom found between workman and employer.

A Letter of Thanks

Our tenth year of business in Napanee closes with 1894, and 1895 begins a new ade. We thank our customers for the fact that those ten years have placed us in con- of the largest retail business within a radius of one hundred miles, and trust that in each the next ten every reader will find success and happiness.

We are pardonably proud of the fact that while the closing year has been marked eneral business disaster, and the best houses find a shrinkage in their volume of trade an again repeat our claim of the largest year's business in our history. Our business 1894 has been materially larger than for any previous year. We think our clean, safe economical system and sincere hard work deserve some of the credit for this, and we think they can be depended on to accomplish much more. As you know, each year of und success adds to our power to serve you well. Larger selling means larger and closer ying, and more economy in handling goods. Our business is conducted on methods which

Cash, and One Price

On these lines we shall continue to work, and with the added advantages of an increased output and a store which is the pride of our town, can safely promise better satisfaction than ever.

Again we thank you for your very generous patronage in the years past and assure you that you will find us in future just as willing and a little more able to win your trade and your good will, and to make of the Big Store all the year round

HOW TO CHOOSE A SPONGE.

Don't Buy a Bright Yellow One and Look Out for Discoloration.

Although the difference between a good and a bad sponge is very marked, but few people seem able to appreciate it. The first requisite of a good sponge is that it should be dark in color. The beautiful yellow sponges commonly on druggists' windows are a delu- compare. The natural color is it is a medium brown, and the yel- are ies have been bleached by a so ath, which destroys their elas- Land makes them wear out much f.

wheel of a sponge should be vel- that should compress into a very such by squeezing, and it must be d color. The best and most are Levant sponges. They from the eastern Mediterranean. The Dalmatian sponge is next in quality and price. There are very many others, however, known to the trade as horse sponges, Zamocca sponges, yellow, velvet, sheep's wool and glove sponges. The prettiest, and at the same time the cheapest, is the grass sponge, which is made up of myriads of small filaments and looks like a ball of yellow wool.

The majority of sponges used in this country come from Florida. The sponge after being detached from the bottom, either by a dredge net or an instrument something like a sickle, which is made for the purpose, is allowed to lie in the sun until the flesh decomposes.

The sponges are then trodden under foot in running water until the flesh is all washed away, leaving the skeleton, which is the sponge as we know it. If the decomposition is allowed to go too far yellow spots will appear upon the sponge and damage it. They are then packed up and sent to the dealer, and after a further washing put on the market. The export trade of New York in sponges is very large, and they are exported to every country in Europe.—New York World.

Overdressed Men.

Some men are constantly overdressed. Observant passengers on a Third avenue elevated train noted a conspicuous instance of this the other day. Beside a modest, spectacle young woman in plain traveling dress sat a young man who looked as if he might be her new-made husband. A long and rich overcoat was unbuttoned and thrown back so as to show a low-cut waist-coat that in turn displayed a figured shirt front adorned with diamond buttons. Running diagonally across the shirt front was a pale lavender four-in-hand tie of rich satin, bearing a conspicuous pin. A double watch chain carried an ornate locket that dangled over the waistcoat. The trousers seemed to be of black broadcloth, and the shoes were of patent leather, ornamented with a toecap of intricate design. The youth's hair was cut "snapper" and a black Derby hat crowned all.—New York Sun.

Adolphustown Parish.—Missionary Meetings.

On Sunday the 13th inst., D. V., the Rev. F. D. Woodcock, M. A., and the Rev. A. L. Gean, P. D., will hold Missionary Meetings in St. Paul's church, Sandhurst, at 11 o'clock; in St. Alban's, Adolphustown, at 3 o'clock; and in St Jude's, Gosport, at 7 o'clock. Collection for the Mission Fund at every meeting.

Parish of Bath.

St. John's church never looked better than it does this Christmas season in its festal attire, and as we expected the rearrangement of the choir seats greatly improves its general appearance. The services on Xmas Day were very inspiriting, the attendance good and the number of Comunicants (adding the attendance at both Celebrations) large, while the offertory was a fair average, with more presents in kind than in former years, for which the Rector expresses his hearty thanks.

Hawley

The Anglican congregation at Hawley held their Christmas services on the Sunday after Christmas Day. There was a good attendance and all the communicants made their Christmas Communion. The special offertory given to the priest in charge of the Mission was more than usually liberal, besides which a handsome sum had been collected by subscription which was also presented to him. When it is remembered that this congregation is only a small one, and that they are now contemplating the task of building a church towards which they have all contributed according to their ability it will readily be seen how highly they appreciate the services of the dear old mother church of the English speaking race.

Parish of Camden.

Sunday next will be the Festival of the Epiphany, services as follows: St. Luke's, Camden East, morning prayer, Holy Communion, 11 o'clock, Holy Trinity, Yarker, Holy Communion, evening prayer, 3 o'clock; St. John's, Newburgh, 7 o'clock; Napanee Mills 7 o'clock; Centreville 3 o'clock —The S. S. entertainment owing to the weather was not a success financially, but the entertainment was a wonderful success itself. The children acquitted themselves in a manner deserving all praise and showed most careful training and just praise is due to those who undertook the great task. It is hoped it will be repeated at an early date to give those who were unable to go an opportunity of seeing one of the best entertainments ever held by the children of Camden East.

Effects of Deep-Sea Pressure.

It is not unusual for bottles of champagne to be dipped and trolled in salt water, when there is no ice on shipboard, in order to get the wine to a palatable temperature, but never long enough to cause contact between the salt water and the wine. We can hardly tell what the effect upon the wine would be if the bottle were immersed at a great depth for any considerable time. It is a fact, however, that if an ordinary glass bottle, tightly corked and sealed, be sunk in, say, fifty fathoms of salt water and left there for about ten minutes, it may, when brought to the surface, be found partly full of water. We say "may," because the pressure of the superincumbent mass of water will either force the water through the porous glass, force the cork into the bottle, or break the bottle.

By a law of hydrostatics the pressure of water is in proportion to its vertical height and its area at the base. It is reckoned that the pressure of water on any body plunged into it is about one pound to the square inch for every two feet of the depth. Bottles filled with fresh water, tightly corked and sealed, have been sunk to great depths in the ocean, and where the enormous pressure has not burst the bottles it has driven in the cork and displaced the fresh with salt water. Pieces of wood have been weighed and sunk in the sea, with the result that the tissues have become so condensed that the wood has lost its buovance and will never float again. It could not even be burned when apparently quite dry.—Home Journal.

Lumber Practically Unknown.

Many of the finest woods in existence are yet unknown, or only slightly known, to the manufacturers of wood in the civilized world. The woods of Central and South America are, perhaps, the most remarkable as well as the least known, says The Lumber World. In the yet untouched forests of this continent are many woods far finer than any of those now in use. These woods range from pure white to jet black in color, and many of them are most beautifully marked and veined. Some of them are so hard that they turn the edges of axes, chisels and other tools, while the band saw cuts them only slowly. In the Columbian Exposition there were many displays of little known woods, and the finest of them were those from Argentine Republic, Brazil and other South American countries. Some of these southern woods yielded to the teeth of the band saw not the ordinary sawdust, but fine powder, fine as the finest flour, so hard were the woods. Some of them burned but slowly. Others possess qualities that keep them free from insects. Some of them seem to be practically indestructible by air and water. All along the eastern slopes of the Andes, up to the snow line on those great elevations, throughout all the great river valleys, and in some of the wide areas of level country in South America, are great forests of fine woods that are especially fit for the finest cabinet and furniture work, and also fer shipbuilding, carpentry and other industrial arts in which wood is the "raw material." These great forests are now an unknown quantity in the commercial world, but they will come rapidly into the knowledge of men and into industrial use when once the railroad has reached them. Before many years, it is safe to predict, the South American and Central American republics will be threaded by railroads, and then those wonderful woods will be drawn upon to supply the demand for new and fine woods in all the civilized countries.

ONTARIO'S POULTRY EXPERT.

Mr. L. G. Jarvis Getting Ready to Study the Egg and Poultry Question.

Mr. L. G. Jarvis is well known to all show goers in Canada and many in the United States. His recent appointment as manager of the Poultry Department in connection with the Ontario Experimental Farm at Guelph affords us the opportunity of introducing him to those of our readers who are not acquainted with him personally.

For several years he was one of the largest and most successful exhibitors, being one of the first to exhibit at the American exhibitions. Mr. Jarvis has been one of the leading judges in America for the last twenty years, he was one of the judges at the World's Fair, and several years judged at Madison Square, New York city. He has taken a great interest in Agricultural exhibitions, for several years he was Assistant Superintendent, and one year Superintendent of the Western Fair, London. Mr. Jarvis operated a fruit farm at Port Stanley, while their he was appointed Justice of the Peace by the Ontario Goverument. He also was Chairman for several years of the School Board.

ings, silver spangled Hamburgs, white Cochins, Houdans, W. C. B. Polands, Indian game, Spanish, Minocras, white Leghorns, black Javas and Langshans. A record will be kept of the amount of feed and quality of feed each pen consumes during the year, together with the amount of eggs laid, etc. Incubators and brooders will be used as well as hens for hatching and rearing, for which suitable rooms have been provided. Experiments will be made in crossing one or more varieties every year, so as to find out the best market fowl, the ones that will mature the earliest and be the most profitable for the farmer.—Canadian Poultry Review.

Good Words For Japan.

An American who has been practicing law in Tokio for the last seven years, has just returned home to New York, absolutely in love with Japan and its people. He says the nation deserves to win in this war with China, precisely as civilization deserves to follow barbarism, and must always follow it, according to the laws of man. No one who is not in direct contact with the Japanese can appreciate the fervor and the indomitable will that animate every man at this period of the country's enlightenment. It seems to move like an electric current through each class of the realm, from the highest to the lowest. This gentleman further says that thoughtful men in the center of this struggle watch the development of the Japanese with a feeling akin to amazement; progress usually proceeds with a slow step, but in the new Japan it goes with leaps that can be felt and seen.

MILITARY TELEGRAPHY.

European Armies Making Good Use of Electricity.

Recent accounts of military evolutions in Europe go to show that great progress is being made in the utilization of both the telegraph and the telephone, especially in cavalry work. During the late cavalry manoeuvres in England the field telegraph accompanied the cavalry at a trot, the wire being laid as fast as the cavalry advanced. When the cavalry retired it was reeled up with equal rapidity. It is understood that this demonstration of the possibility of the telegraph wire being used with cavalry will lead to an extension of the scope of the telegraph organization in the British army.

In telephone work, an interesting experiment between Berlin and Potsdam is reported. A telephone line was laid on the march by two cavalry patrols, each consisting of an officer and two under officers. One patrol started from Berlin, the other from Potsdam, very early in the morning. Each patrol was furnished with a complete telephone set and a supply of reels, each of which contained about a mile of steel wire. The end of the wire was connected to the town circuits in Berlin and Potsdam respectively, and the reel was so fixed on a carrier that the wire could unroll as the cavalryman rode along. A second man rode behind, and, catching the wire with a sort of fork on the end of his lance, by which it was made about half as long again, threw it into the upper branches of the trees lining the road. The officer went first, and the two men running the wire were about thirty paces apart. When the first reel was emptied they halted. The telephone was connected, and a horn blown to signal the starting point, from which an answering signal was sounded. After a talk over the wire the new reel was joined up, and the process continued. Midway between the cities the patrols met, the wires were joined together, and speech was found to be perfect. The order was then given to take up the circuit, and each patrol reeling up all the way, worked back to its starting point. The laying of over thirty miles of wire took only four hours.

The French are also alive to the importance of the telephone in army manœuvering. Each regiment of French infantry is now supplied with two portable telephone instruments, between three and four miles of wire, carried on bobbins, by men, a light bamboo ladder and two forked poles. By the use of these appliances, communication is instantly established in billets between regimental and brigade headquarters, or from any of the outposts to the rear.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

The Municipal Elections passed off very quietly in Napanee. The chief interest centred around the mayoralty contest, and both candidates stumped around pretty lively to get out the vote. Mayor Stevens said at the nomination meeting that "he generally came out at the right end of the horn at the finish" and the EXPRESS is pleased to say that he has emerged "right side up with care" from the present contest, although his opponent, Mr. Jamieson, made a plucky fight and polled a large vote. The following is the vote by Wards:

FARMERS' INSTITUTE.

The meeting of the Lennox Farmers' Institute, held in the town hall here, on Tuesday afternoon was not largely attended owing no doubt to its being held so soon after the municipal elections. The meagre attendance is to be regretted, as the addresses were very practical, instructive and productive of much good. However, those present will no doubt disseminate the intelligence gleaned to their brother farmers, who were unable to be present, and it may thereby be fruitful of good results in advancing the cause of agriculture in this district. The president, Mr. U. Sills, acted as chairman and introduced the several speakers.

Mr. J. C. Judd, of Morton, representing the Good Roads association of Ontario, was the first speaker. He is a fluent and lucid talker and fully conversant with his subject, and from the apparent interest taken in his address the roads of Lennox county may bear material evidence in the near future, that his words have taken root. He said it was unfortunate that the meeting had been called on the day following the municipal elections, as they were so engrossing that they evidently commanded all the farmers attention. His mission was to solicit the attention of the farmers to the necessity of good roads. There was a good roads association and it was under the auspices of that association that he appeared here to-day. Good roads could not be built under the statute labor system now in vogue. The farmers suffer more from bad roads than any other class. They necessarily had to draw their wares to market, sometimes a long distance, and the question of roads entered largely into the question of determining their profits. In towns and cities they had there frontage tax, etc., and these insured good roads, but the farmer banked his all on the statute labor system. In Addington and other counties in this district, which he had visited, he found that while the main roads were kept in good repair, the cross-roads were, generally speaking, in a miserable condition. The main roads were kept up by grants from the township councils, but the grants were not sufficient and the cross roads had to depend on the statute labor system. Mr. Judd then quoted statistics to show the loss experienced in the United States and Canada by bad roads. In Great Britian alone it was estimated that a saving of five million pounds sterling had been effected by keeping their roads in good condition. In Ontario there were three hundred and fifty thousand horses, and the loss occasioned by rough roads in this Province in one year could hardly be estimated. In some sections at some seasons of the year, the roads were almost impassible. There were 2,000 cheese factories in Canada and by good roads the cost of hauling the milk could be so reduced as to add about a half a million dollars to the profit of the cheese trade. Bad roads were a fraud on those who would build good roads. The statute labor system was a farce. It reminded him of two horses—a lazy, and a willing one—one willing to do all the work and the other willing to let it. Under the statute labor system the work was not done intelligently and there was no headwork called into requisition in constructing the roads. Now one essential to good roads, and one that was constantly violated under the statute labor system, was getting the water off it. Unless the water was drained off they would never have a road. Another thing that militated against good roads was the lack of proper machinery. With a road machine a team of horses and a man can make as much road, and make it better, than 150 men, with the old fashioned scrapers and appliances. Every township should have a roller, weighing at least three ton. Good high turnpike gravel roads—well rolled before the gravel is put down, and better rolled after it is put down—would make a durable road and one that answered fully as well as macadam. Another reprehensible custom he noticed was that in most localities the roads were only fixed in the summer, generally along in the month of June, when they were full of holes. Roads should be made in May and maintained throughout the summer months. A hole in a road should be repaired at its inception, instead of letting it run for a year and then having one general repair. It is a well established fact that what is everbodys business is nobodys business. Each township should have a road supervisor—a practical man who understands roadmaking—and the business of keeping the roads throughout the township should be entrusted to him. Abolish the statute labor system, pay the road tax into the council, and they would have better roads, more work done and better satisfaction all around. In reply to a question Mr Judd said the road machine he spoke of was on four wheels, and like an enormous ploughshare. It was made of steel and reversible It would turnpike a road, with a gradual slope down to the ditch, and do it in an incredible short space of time.

Mr. W. T. Gibbard read a paper on Poultry that was very interesting. He said that he had gone in for thoroughbred Poultry within the last year. He had attended the Poultry exhibition in New Hamburgh and caught the "chicken pox" very bad. He was pleased to see, that in poultry, Canada was sweeping the markets and leaving her old rival, the United States, in the back ground. Canadians had carried off the prizes in the recent exhibitions in the United States. He said that the paper he was about to read was prepared rather hastily and was not written for poultry breeders. We regret that lack of space precludes us from giving Mr Gibbard's able paper in full. He said that the hen was the most neglected creature on the farm. The farmer went the whole hog on the pig; he pulled the wool over the sheep's eyes, but the hen is immortal—for her son never sets. He read statistics comparing the revenue derived from butter, sheep, cereals, etc, and that from the hen, showing clearly that she plays an important part and and was a source of great profit to the farmer. If the former was only aware of the immense possibilities of the hen, she would not be shoved to the coldest place in the barn, as she generally is. Mr. Gibbard's paper dealt with the different breeds of hens, and he strongly emphasized the necessity of keeping them clear of lice.

Mr. J. S Hutt, of Guelph, gave an instructive address on the proper management of an orchard. The first essential was suitable soil, strong, thrifty trees, and they should be planted in straight rows, as it facilitates cultivation. He was not in favor of ploughing an orchard as there was danger of injurying the small roots. A spring tooth cultivator was the best thing for an orchard. A hoe crop was a good thing for the trees till they started bearing, but after that it should be discontinued. A grain crop or sod in an orchard should

DUTCH CHEESE-MAKING.

THE GOUDA IS A FAVORITE CHEESE EVERYWHERE.

The Bergue and Leyden are Practically the Same as the Gouda—A Cheap But Nutritious Variety—Made Entirely of Skim Milk.

A cheese known as the Gouda, from the name of a Dutch town so-called, is one of the type of firm cheeses similar in many respect to the Edam, but richer in fat and of a more delicate flavor than the Edam previously described. It is a flat oval, and weighs from 12 to 50 lbs. It is the type of several varieties so closely similar in form and character as to be all included under this name generally, but specifically they go in different localities under the names of Leyden and Bergues, and all are to some extent merely Dutch cheeses.

The Gouda is a favorite cheese everywhere, and a large quantity of it is imported for the use of the European immigrants in all parts of North America. But it is rapidly finding favor among those to the manor born, and the trade in it is constantly extending, so that its manufacture is fast becoming an established industry in localities in the United States, where the suitable conditions for it are available. These are a blue or June grass pasture; a moist climate; pure water; cows that yield milk of a fairly good quality, such as the Ayrshire, the Shorthorn, or the Holstein, or high grade natives, crosses of these breeds. Of course, as must be apparent to all experienced in any kind of dairy work, the skill, or at least some natural ability to follow closely described methods and adapt circumstances to the requisite processes, are indispensable. One cannot expect to tumble head first into this business of fancy cheese making, and the man or the woman must come first of all in the necessaries of the case.

The process for the making of the Gouda is in the main exactly like that for the Edam, except that the curd is made for the former from milk partly skimmed, by taking one milking fresh and a previous one skimmed, and forming the curd as for the Edam, cutting it in the same way but, afterwards kneading it thoroughly with the hands, and then treading it by the feet, so as to get a soft homogenous paste, and to completely separate the whey, or at least have what of it cannot be expelled most intimately mixed with the curd, The modern curd mill, of course will obviate the rather objectionable foot work of the Dutch cheese maker. During this mixing and working of the curd, some-the bottom of the mold pierced with holes for this purposes. Each day the cheese is rubbed with salt and turned in the mold, thus gradually acquiring its flat, oval shape (Fig. 6).

By this time the cheese has become firm and is able to retain its shape, after which it is removed to the curing cellar, a close place without exposure to the air, in which it is washed and turned twice a week, This continued moisture, without any drying by currents of air, results in a slow change in the curd by which a peculiar consistence and flavor are acquired, and a very pleasaut and acceptable cheese is produced, although skimmed milk only is used in its manufacture.

This is a cheap cheese, but by the special process of curing it has a good flavor and buttery consistence, quite equal to an interior cheese made from whole milk, or even a common quality of cheese thus made. It sells for 10 cents a pound, requiring for a cheese of ten pounds about forty quarts of milk.

This cheese is particularly suited to the creamery on account of the economy effected by a profitable use of the skimmed milk. In Holland it is made only in the best butter making districts, and thus utilizes what would not only be a waste, but a source of inconvenience to the dairyman. Doubtless there is a wide field for the manufacture of such cheese here, for its quality, size, and price, all combine to render it a desirable addition to the bill of fare of persons who are forced to practice economy, and may find in this kind of cheese a welcome addition to the modestly furnished table, quite within their narrow means and equally nutritious, if less costly than the more expensive kinds.

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

STELLA.

The funeral of the late Warden, R. Patterson, took place from his residence on the south shore of the island, on Thursday, 3rd inst. It was very largely attended, there being seventy four vehicles in line. The body was taken into the Presbyterian chuch, where the Rev. Mr. Cumberland delivered a very touching and fitting address. The remains were laid in the vault.

Mr. J. S. Neilson, our genial Postmaster and general merchant, who has been suffering from a severe attack of sciatica for the past few months, having decided to retire from the business for a time, has engaged the services of Mr. R. A. Caughey to manage the business for him during the winter. Mr. Sylvester McDonald will be his assistant.

Miss M. E. Neilson and Alex. Glenn represented Stella at the Bachelors Ball, in Bath, on New Year's night.

No ice yet, which makes the crossing quite disagreeable.

Prof. Reilly, of Kingston, intends conducting a dancing school in Stella, during the winter.

The shadow social held at Mrs. Scott's, on Tuesday eve., in aid of the Kingston Hospital, was a success.

WILTON.

Mr. and Mrs. Rufus Ovens have the sincere sympathy of all in the loss of their only child, Isabella Grace, an infant of eight months, on Friday morning. The funeral services were conducted at the house Saturday afternoon by Rev. D. Flemming.

mentioned. Next issue I will state the date if known.

Now as all this is over, and nomination and election to everything went off very slick, with the exception of there being no seconder to Mr. Samuel J. Miller, who was nominated for Deputy-reeve for North Fredericksburgh. This let Mr. Sills in by acclamation. Some thinks there was something wrong with the clerk, who is a man who does business for the public as every clerk does.

Now as some of the people have told their experience of the matter, I will tell you mine. I think myself that this is like the last election of Lennox. For the Ernestown section their was Symington as reformer, Meacham as conservate, then the patron. Meachams vote was 246, Symington, 144, Brisco 147 When word was received in Napanee stating the number of votes for the three men, the first shout from the crowd was, Where are the Conservative patrons? I think if Mr. Samuel Miller had a seconder, it would have been, Where is Deputy reeve Sills? As for the old councillors, I take great pleasure in saying that it is said they did the business fair and square, and as cheaply as possible.

Now gentlemen, and all the readers of this valuable paper, the Napanee EXPRESS, I wish you success through life. I thank you Mr. Editor kindly for this space in your paper and remain an honest young reformer from the sod.

DENBIGH.

Rev. Mr. Knight who has been appointed to assist the Rev. Geo. Hick of Vennachar in his arduous labours in this mission, arrived here with la Saturday stage, and conducted t services in the Methodist church this village yesterday (Sunday) afte noon. He preached a very earnest an appropriate sermon from the text, "Am I my brothers keeper?" Owing to the rather stormy weather the congregation was not as numerous as usual.

The trustees of our village school seem to have been fortunate in securing for this year the services of Mr. W. File, of Napanee, who has entered upon his duties and made a very favourable impression upon his pupils as well as upon all others who had the pleasure of meeting him.

Miss Grace Cassida of Northbrook, who has been reingaged by the trustees of S. S. No. 6, (Thompson Settlement) returned to Denbigh with Saturday's stage, and opened school on Monday.

Mr. Geo. Barclay is staying at the Denbigh House, visiting and assisting his brother, Mr. W. G. Barclay, our popular Photographer, who is as usual doing a rushing business.

Mr. Julius Kittner of Arnprior, has been favouring his brother, August Kittner, and other friends here with a short visit.

Miss Annie Petzold is visiting friends in Raglan, County of Renfrew, where she intends to spend a couple of weeks.

Visitors at the Chaston House, Mr. N. Cassida and Miss G. Cassida, of Northbrook. At the Lutheran Parsonage, Mr. Albert Liedke and Miss Bertha Liedke, of Raglan.

not be allowed. May should never be taken off an orchard. Wood ashes was the best manure for a tree as it contained all the elements taken from the soil by the tree. Don't bank up manure around the trunk of a tree. Spread it out as far as the branches extend. March or April was the best time for pruning. A tree should be pruned every year. Paris Green was a good thing for killing insects on a tree, and a force pump was the proper thing to apply it with. For doing away with scab on fruit, blue vitrol, applied before the buds come out, was the very best thing that could be used. It could not, however, be very safely applied after the bud comes out. For fungus diseases, for applying after the buds came out, 4 lbs of copper of sulphite, 4 lbs of lime, and 40 gallons of water, was highly recommended. Two ounces of paris green added to this solution would kill all the insects. If this solution was properly sprayed on and followed up for a few years it would free the fruit of scab and the tree of insects. Above all things he cautioned them to never allow the tree to overbear. Judicious thinning out of the blossoms pays. Although he knew that it went against the grain to thin out the fruit, he had proved from experience that it was the most profitable course to pursue. Overbearing not only injures the fruit but injures the vitality of the tree. Seeds exhausted the tree more than the fruit. Spraying was better for getting rid of moths than traps.

Mr. J. W. Strenhoff, of Sebringville, gave an interesting and profitable lecture on selecting, breeding and feeding cows. He said that selecting a cow was a question of vital importance. A high price for goods did not mean much, unless you could raise them at a lower price than you secured it for. He was not an advocate of any particular breed. There was often 100 per cent. difference in the value of cows in the same herd. You should always buy a cow when it is giving milk. Breed was no guarantee of a paying animal. They had to deal with the individual cow. A good external point to go by, in selecting a dairy cow, was its femininity. The more feminine and sensitive cow, was generally the best dairy cow. In feeding a young animal for the dairy, you want to keep it growing and moving along nicely, but don't let it run to fat, as you can ruin it for dairy purposes that way. A cow should be bred when she is about two years old; but then don't go and breed her to a bull that hasn't a dairying quality about it. The cheese and dairying department of the farm was the best paying part; while prices went down in all other lines the price of cheese went up. Mr. Steinhoff, here gave an illustration from his own cheese factory of the different results attained by different men. One man made $50 per cow, while his neighbor made $19 out of his. The difference was owing to the feed and care taken of the cow, and the kind of cow kept. You often find that the cow that gives the most milk, gives also the best milk. There was no animal that responded to kindliness like the cow. No man that did not use his cows kindly should engage in dairying. He believed that the cheese market would remain about the same as it is. While the amount of cheese manufactured was increasing, Great Britian went on continually consuming more cheese. The Babcock tester was a great machine, and a small one should be in every farm house in the country. Some say that we should pay according to the quality, not by weight, in the cheese factories. They had tried it in their cheese factory, and while he believed it to be the best system, it had not given satisfaction and at the end of two years they had to abandon it. But in butter making it was the only just and proper system. He had received milk at his butter factory varying in fat from 3¾ up to 5 5/6. The milk tested 3¾ would only make 3 lbs of butter per 100 lbs of milk, while the milk tested 5 5/6 would make 6 lbs of butter per 100 lbs of milk. It was the only honest system. The farmers would derive great benefit by getting a babcock machine and making private tests. He had seen skim milk that showed ¼ per cent. of butter fat. The result attained with a Babcock machine would be a revelation to them. The large price that we secured for our cheese was largely due to the high standard of it and the honest name we had secured.

The meeting in the evening was so poorly attended that the addresses were abandoned, and an open discussion, in which all were at liberty to participate, held, that no doubt proved of great benefit to those present.

The Institute held meetings on the 9th and 10th inst., at Stella.

aromatic seeds, crushed with gray salt, a mixture of common salt and charcoal finely powdered, are added.

The cheese is then molded by the hand, wrapped in fine muslin, and put in the press and squeezed into the right shape in the molds which are made in two halves. This removes all the whey that need be, leaving only sufficient to confer on it during the curing of the cheese, the desired flavor produced by the fermentation of the curd, by which the sugar in the whey is decomposed and made to re-act on the curd. The cheeses are then placed in the same kind of receptacles as are used in curing the Edam cheese, and in fact are submitted to precisely the same kind of treatment for the curing.

The Leyden cheese is somewhat less flat than the Gouda, and is only three-fourths the size and weight. They are all marked with the imprint of the arms of the town, which consist of two keys crossed, the official insignia of the archbishop of the city at the time of its establishment around the noted cathedral. This imprint has now lost its ancient significance and now represents only the sign of a genuine cheese. Thus in the whirligig of time do things change and pass from a high to a low degree or otherwise. But the American maker of Leyden cheese uses the same imprint, doubtless in total ignorance of its origin, but only for the purpose of deluding the purchasers of his goods into the harmless belief that his cheeses have crossed the briny deep and are of genuine Dutch origin. This is a matter, in this connection for the exhibition of some such patriotic regard for home-made goods and for the preservation of native industries, as is exhibited by the English people, who enforce by legislation the marking as foreign all imported farm products and even bring Canada under the same ban as a foreign competitor. But it is already the case in regard to Canadian dairy goods that they are winning golden opinions from the English consumers, and the dairymen of the United States may well follow in that straight and narrow path of strict honesty and good business shrewdness trodden by their neighbors: for to make the best, and to maintain strictly the same high quality without varying, is one of the fundamental rules for success in any business.

The Bergues cheese is one of similar kind, but made of wholly skimmed milk and pressed flatter than the Leyden in special molds, while they are soft as taken from the press. The milk is curdled at the unusually low temperature of 67 to 75 degrees, but hasty coagulation is procured by the use of sufficient rennet to make the curd in half an hour, at this low temperature. The curd is cut in the ordinary manner, and placed in the vats (Fig. 3) without any delay and pressed by the hands. The vat is of wood as shown, hooped and having holes around it, for the drainage of the whey, and is a mere hoop about 14 inches in diameter and 7 in depth. They are placed on a draining table sloping a little to permit the whey to run off, and the curd, wrapped in thin muslin, is pressed down in them, and so remains until it is firm enough to be lifted out without breaking. Before removing the cheese, however, the maker puts it under some little pressure to squeeze out the moisture, for eight hours, after which the cloth is removed and the Judging from indications we would come to the conclusion that Muncipal feelings ran pretty high in Bath. HIS CHRISTMAS EVE.

To the editor of The Express.

Thinking that I might make some fun for your readers by telling them what I had for my Xmas presents I send you the following account of what my boy and girls gave me on Xmas eve. Reviewing it all it looks to me as if they thought I was going to start housekeeping all over again. On Xmas eve I heard the waggon come in the yard and then one of the children came rushing in exclaiming 'Oh mother, we might as well bring our presents in as we can't keep them till morning." I said you must have bought the whole town, when you took the waggon after it. We had a pleasant time and were all so jolly together. The first thing they gave me was a little table. Of course the old one in the parlor has been taken out since and the new one put in its place. My eldest girl gave me twelve sauce dishes, to complete a tea set they presented me with last 24th of May. I have been married 24 years. She also gave me a cigar case and my other daughter had it filled with cigars. The other members of the family were not neglected for the girls presented their brother with a nice silk handkercheif and a checkerboard. Then my boy said he was not going to let the girls outdo him so he went out and brought in a lambs wool door mat, a large tea tray, a nice large colored table cloth and an all wool shirt for his father. But he was not done yet. After a time we all went to bed but my boy, he having to remain, as it was his turn to look after the greenhouse. In the morning we heard a horrible noise down stairs, and what should have occasioned it but Tom turning a grindstone, fixed on two trestles, which he presented to his father. Do you think these were good presents or not.—GEO. LLOYD.

THE catastrophe which overtook the Toronto Globe on Sunday last, while it may incommode it for a time, has in no way impaired its vitality, as the day after the fire it came out as bright and newsy as ever. The buoyant tone impregnating Monday's issue is a good augury for the future, and we predict that The Globe will go right on increasing in interest and usefulness. The Globe, under its present management, has come to be recognized as one of the foremost journals in America and the men at the helm are not of the stuff that will sit downcalmly and

BEWARE OF PNEUMONIA

A PHYSICIAN TELLS HOW TO WARD OFF THE DISEASE.

Don't Get Run Down or Fatigued—And if a Sudden Chill Comes on Take Some Quinine, a Hot Foot Bath and Keep Warm in Bed.

Although more or less prevalent throughout the year, pneumonia is peculiarly dangerous during the opening months of winter. With the first frosts a very marked increase takes place in the number of cases, and during this cold, damp weather extra precautions should be taken.

Pneumonia is probably produced by an earth germ, and when frost prevails the soil beneath the house is the only ground which is not frozen. The germs gradually work towards the warm, moist earth and the house really acts as a sort of flue, which forms a ready mode of egress for them. The proper ventilation of rooms is therefore an important factor in guarding against pneumonia, one, however, which is too often overlooked.

Lack of personal hygiene is the chief predisposing cause of the disease. Irregular hours, insufficient nourishment, dyspepsia, excessive fatigue or some disease which has lowered the general tone of the system, all weaken the power of resisting the pneumonic germ. When the system is run down, a sudden exposure to cold may prove fatal, while in a normal condition of body it would be thrown off. An instance which recently came under my observation will serve to illustrate the importance of regularity in meals as a safeguard against disease.

Two young ladies of my acquaintance were traveling in a railway car, next to a man just recovered from smallpox, as

UP-TO-DATE MINING METHODS.

They Have Opened a New Gold Era For the Pacific Coast.

The golden lining to the silver clouds that hung over this country a year ago is just becoming apparent. When this Government ceased its purchases of silver, and the mints of India were closed to the white metal, the financial outlook was dark, indeed. But out of good often comes, and whatever effect these measures may have had they have resulted beneficially in causing a greatly increased activity in gold mining. Never before in the history of this State have the prospects been so flattering. The spectacular effect that accompanied earlier mining excitements is wanting, but there is in its place an element of greater stability and permanence. The romantic era, when the population, red-shirted and roughly clad, wandered among the gulches and foothills of the Sierras, with pick and pan, searching for the precious particles among the gravel of the river beds, has passed into history. The more intensely dramatic era, when the fever of speculation coursed through the veins, when every fluctuation in the prices of stocks was watched with eager interest by millionaire and pauper, by the clerk in the counting house and the serving maid in the kitchen or nursery, when fortunes were made and lost in a day, and when everybody was rich whether his wealth was evidenced by a comfortable bank account or by a scrap of worthless paper—this second and more unwholesome era has also passed, to return no more.

The mining of to-day, while it lacks the element of wild excitement, is on a more solid basis and has a far more substantial prosperity. Mining methods are more scientific than they were, wasteful and extravagant processes have been laid aside, new and improved machinery has been brought into use, and private companies, operating quietly and soberly, are reaping a harvest undreamed of even in the days when the delirium of speculation was among us. The placer mines have been diligently worked over. There are still golden grains and nuggets in the river beds, but not in sufficient quantities generally to pay corporations for working them, although individual miners can still make "grub."

But the placer mines at best held only the overflow of the richer original deposits. The wealth in the hillsides poured over and the surplus was carried with the rain into the rivers. From north to south, throughout the whole strength of the Sierra range, are ledges laden with their golden treasure as yet untouched. Quartz mining is still in its infancy despite the vast stores of wealth that have already been wrested from the earth; drift mining will yet add untold millions to the wealth of this State. The output of gold this year will far exceed anything of recent years.

Not in this state alone, but throughout the world, this renewed activity is seen. Colorado, prostrated last year by the repeal of the Sherman law, stands to-day as one of the wealth-producing states of the world. This year California will be closely pushed for first place among the gold bearing States of the Union. Two years ago the gold product of Colorado was less than $5,000,000—$4,743,000—while California produced more than twice that amount. The next year Colorado increased its output sixty five per cent. while the increase in California was only eight per cent. This year the difference between the two will be still further decreased. In Montana twice as many properties are being worked this year as last; in Australia there is unusual activity and the output of South Africa, which a few years ago contributed practically nothing to the world's supply is estimated for this peat at $48,000,000.

When California, Australia and Russia first began, in the early fifties, the immense output of gold, prices were seriously affected. Prior to 1850 the annual product had never exceeded $38,000,000, or slightly more than will be produced in the two States of California and Colorado this year. During the next five years the annual average was $137,000,000, the highest point reached being in 1853, when the output was $155,000,000. After that date there was a decline in production. In 1873, twenty years later, the output was $96,200,000; in 1883 it was $91,000,000. Last year,

SIR JOHN THOMPSON.

Wm Lutton in the "Passing Show" in the Earth says :—Tragic beyond expression was the death of Sir John Thompson. In the moment of the highest triumph he could hope to achieve, admitted to the secret councils of the greatest soverign on earth, sworn in as a member of that body whose functions reach out to the ends of the earth, death came to him. He was not a great man at all, but he had talents, and he used them for his own advancment and the success of his party. His mind was not of an original cast, he was not magnetic; there was no word or thought in the soul of the man which could move or lift men to higher ideals, taking them out of themselves and making their blood flow like lava. This marks the man divinely possessed, and Sir John Thompson was a politician, not a lofty statesman. He was essentially a trimmer, and his ambition was to keep his party together and in office. This was the policy of that able leader who did not leave Sir John his mantle of finesse and cunning, and he pursued it faithfully. In a word, Sir John Thompson was not a great inspirational voice to the country, which so much needs the moral sense and lofty motives in its politics, but rather while personally pure, a tolerater of a system of bribery of the people which has already produced the worst effects.

The only public man in Canada today with a lofty idea of statesmanship is Mr. Laurier, and this is said without any reference whatever to the color of his politics. The man has ideals. His voice rings clear and true. He moves men because disdaining the clap trap of the hustings, he speaks the high thought of his inmost heart. The eye of his mind comprehends the larger horizon; he rises above parochialism; his words almost classic in their beauty, adorn, but do not overdress, his thought.

Sir John Thompson was the best man in a group mediocrities, but the voice that ascribes statesmanship to him, in the lofty meaning of that word will be the voice of flattery. With the exception, possibly, of two men, the colleagues he has left behind are narrow, dull creatures, fitted indeed, to struggle for place and power, to intrigue for gain, to work for the "party," but as destitute of statecraft as Oliver Cromwell was destitute of of court manners.

the other had risen late and had not. The one who had not eaten caught the disease and the other escaped. The ladies were twins and almost exactly similar in physique and temperament, and, in my opinion, the temporary weakening of the system, caused by the omission of the morning meal, accounted for the disease being able to obtain a foothold.

There are three periods during which the susceptibility to pneumonia is greatest. They are early childhood, that is up to seven years of age, between the ages of twenty and forty and after sixty. The power of resistance against pneumonia grows much feebler after sixty years of age, and nine-tenths of the cases prove fatal.

In New York we have a good deal of northeast wind during November and December and the cold, damp weather it generally brings is very favorable to the contraction of "colds' and the subsequent development of pneumonia. The grip left its victims very predisposed to pneumonia and it still exists to some extent in a modified form. This is the disease with which pneumonia most readily combines, but it is found in combination with diphtheria, typhoid fever, measles, scarlet fever and many others.

When a severe or sudden chill has been contracted the main thing is to act quickly, and many a serious illness can be averted and valuable life saved by a little intelligence coupled with promptitude. If possible, send for a doctor immediately, and meanwhile take ten grains of quinine and five drops of spirits of camphor in a little water or on a lump of sugar. These does are for an adult. Then soak the feet in hot water and jump into bed. Simple as these remedies are, they have nipped in the bud many prospective cases of pneumonia.

While soaking the feet, the body should be warmly wrapped in a blanket which should be kept on until some time after the person has entered the bed, in order that free perspiration be continued and not checked.

A good thing to prevent "colds" is to wear wool next the skin. When this is not possible on acccount of the irritation sometimes caused, a mixture of wool and silk will generally be found satisfactory. I would not recommend cotton in any form for underwear, as it is frequently the cause of a dangerous cold by becoming wet and keeping the temperature of the skin below the normal. Care should be taken that the feet do not get wet, or, if so that prompt measures are taken to dry them and a change of hose made.

The care taken of the outside of the body must be supplemented by the same care of the inside. A moderate diet, wholesome food, plenty of rest, regular hours, will keep the whole system in good order and enable it to throw off the germs of disease, which can only obtain a footing when debilitation affords an entrance for the disease and a fruitful soil for its development.—Cyrus Edson, Commissioner of Health for New York.

Clearing a Field of Stumps.

After the harvesting comes a period of cleaning up and reclaiming waste lands. For removing stumps the cut shows a simple method. Two stumps or trees act as levers by means of a rope to which a horse is hitched. Having dug around the roots, start the horse and with an ax at hand, cut the roots or dig the dirt from between until the stump is finally drawn out.

Whooping Cough—For Whooping Cough and all throat affections, chest troubles etc., Hagyard's Yellow Oil is the best embrocation ever discovered. It promptly relieves inflammation, pain and soreness from whatever cause arising.

The most careful estimates place this year's production at $170,000,000. For the four years since 1890 the annual average exceeds that of 1850-55 by $12,000,000.

What is to be the effect of these immense additions to the world's supply of gold! The increased production of 1858-1860 resulted in a decline in the purchasing power of gold, or, express d differently, prices generally rose. The same result should be seen at this time were it not for certain other factors that are at work. The increased supply is in response to an increased demand, and that demand will absorb the surplus as it is produced. Again, the world's stock of gold is far greater now than it was forty years ago, and additions that would materially affect the mass then would not be felt now. It is therefore probable that, unless continued for a number of years, the increased production will not affect the business of the world. The effect in California will, however, be different. The annual addition of fifteen to twenty millions to the wealth of this State is bound to affect all business beneficially. One year's output would be sufficient to build the proposed railroad through the San Joaquin valley. The cost of a new trans-continental line would scarcely be felt if taken out of several years' output.—Argonaut.

Boston School Girls to Be Deprived of Their Favorite Luncheon

Considerable interest is being manifested in regard to the luncheons now provided at recess time for boys and girls in the High schools. At almost every High school in the city the majority of the pupils buy their luncheons from the lunch counter kept by the janitor, and the food so provided consists largely of pies and cakes—"bake-house stuff," as some people call it—and pickles. The janitors keep that kind of food because the pupils will buy it in preference to other more wholesome kinds, and also because there is probably more profit in it. Nevertheless, the parents of the pupils are anxious that some different system may be adopted in the matter of furnishing luncheons. They think it high time that something was done about it, for in schools where there are no lunch counters, peddlers of cheap candy, cocoanut cakes and other unwholesome compounds, make their appearance at recess, and are generally well patronized by the hungry boys and girls.

The first official step toward bettering this state of things was taken recently, when an order was passed by the school board providing that all luncheons sold in the public schools should be such as are approved by the Committee on Hygiene and Physical Training. Moreover the committee was instructed to report at the next meeting of the board a plan for providing suitable luncheons at proper places for the high school pupils.

Just what the committee intends to do is hard to say, but several persons interested are hoping that it will be able to make some arrangement with the New England Kitchen whereby soups, sandwiches, milk, and other wholesome articles of food may be furnished direct to the pupils at moderate prices. The kitchen has its main station on Pleasant street, and another station at the North End. It is thought that soups might be carried from the kitchen to the school in tanks, just as coffee is sometimes transported, and in that way might be served hot. Such a system of providing luncheons would be more favorable to the health of the pupils, and therefore more acceptable to the parents. As for the old system, the janitors are not thought to merit any blame, for they simply provide what the pupils would buy; but now that the committee

A Room of Resources

Here is what is required in the sitting room of a healthy person; a room in which he would have to sleep, or do very litter-making manual labor. First, a bookcase with a great many books in it; next, a table that will keep steady when you write or work at it. Then several chairs that you can move and a sofa that you can sit or lie upon. Next, a cupboard with drawers; next, unless the bookcase and cupboard be very beautiful with painting or carvings, you will want pictures or engravings, such as you can afford, only not stop-gaps, but real works of art upon the wall, or else the wall itself must be ornamented with some beautiful or restful pattern; and last, a vase or two for flowers. This is all we shall want, especially if the floor be good, if it be not, as, by the way, in a modern house it is pretty sure not to be, I admit that a small carpet, that can be bundled out of the way in two minutes, will be useful, and we must also take care that it be beautiful. We can add very little to these necessaries without troubling ourselves and hindering our work, our thought and our rest.

HOW TO KILL A HORSE.

Fire a Bullet Into the Head at the Place Shown by the Spot in the Drawing.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has issued a card showing how horses may be killed scientifically. The information is especially for policemen, who are ordinarily called upon to dispose of sick or suffering ani-

A sick horse belonging to John Morrison fell on one of its legs at the corner of Second and Taylor streets early in the morning. It was allowed to remain there suffering for many hours because no one could be found who would shoot it or who knew how to put it out of its misery. Morton tried to find a police officer who could or would kill the animal, but his search was in vain. Finally he went to the office of the society mentioned, and Mr. Holbrook himself went to the corner where the horse was lying and shot it. The animal died without a struggle.

To shoot a horse so as to kill it instantly it is only necessary to aim so that the bullet will enter the brain by passing through a spot in the middle of the forehead above the eyes. The card is said by the society to be a drawing of a horse's head, showing the exact spot.

Spain's Youthful Monarch.

The Spanish royal family has been staying during the last three months at the royal villa at San Sebastian. They pass the mornings on the beach, but do not bathe, and the afternoons in excursions to the little towns in the neighbourhood, which, although mainly Carlist, receive the young King and his mother with great friendliness. The last great event of the day at San Sebastian was the unveiling of the statue of Admiral Oguendo. When the Queen laid the first stone of the pedestal of this statue some years ago, King Alfonso (more popularly known as "Alfonsito") was a baby in arms, and his Austrian nurse had great difficulty in keeping him still. While his mother was addressing the aristocratic assemblage which had been invited for the occasion in a patriotic speech, and the princesses were gravely listening, "Alfonsito" thought it more amusing to kiss his hand and smile to the handsome young ladies around him, and his mother at last had to put an end to his pranks by a smart tap from her fan. This time he was more conscious of his royal dignity, though in private he is still as boyish as ever. He is a capital billiard-player, but he occasionally leaves the game to have a flirtation with some pretty little girl whom he may see playing with her companions on the beach outside the villa. He is very fond of soldiering, and has a little regiment of his own, composed of 450 boys dressed in the picturesque uniform of the Basque Mountain Corps. The band is composed entirely of orphans, who sang patriotic hymns on the occasion of the unveiling of the statue.—London Sunday Times.

Fees for Interviews.

The New York Sun's correspondent in London at one time wrote to Mr. Gladstone asking him for an interview on the Irish question, and in the course of an interview which followed with Mr. Gladstone's secretary it was learned that a fee of $500 would be expected in payment for the interview, it being understood that Mr. Gladstone should write it himself, and thus make it authoritative. Lord Roberts fixed the price of $100 for an interview upon the threatened war between England and Russia, on another occasion. Richard Mansfield will write an article for a daily paper, but he invariably insists upon being paid for it, though he passes the money over to charity. He believes in the English theory that if a celebrity of any sort writes an article for a paper for nothing he invariably does harm to the working journalists. So it may be that W. S. Gilbert was philanthropic in his demand for 20 guineas from the female interviewer who is now suing him for libel.—Buffalo Express.

Long Sleepers.

When the heat of a tropical or semi-tropical summer dries up every pool and parches the ground to such an extent that it is difficult for animals not endowed with great powers of locomotion to obtain water, they compromise with nature by sleeping off the season of heat and scarcity. The winter sleepers are all pretty well known; but, owing to the summer sleepers being for the most part inhabitants of tropical countries, far removed from the path of trained observers, we are less acquainted with the species practicing that means of escaping the heat and drought of summer. Indeed at present only one mammal, the tenec, a hedgehoglike beast of Madagascar, is known to do so. In South America and Africa various reptiles aestivate. In the plains of Venezuela the alligator, the land and fresh water tortoise, the boa constrictor and several sorts of the smaller kinds of serpent lie motionless during the hottest period of the tropical summer. But their dormancy is not so perfect as that of some hibernators. In Brazil, Australia and the Cape Colony lizards, frogs, tortoises and insects pass months of the rainless season enclosed in hard earth, and in India many species of fish live during the hot season in a torbid condition, imbedded in the hardened clay.—Brooklyn Eagle.

The Use of the Left Hand.

"Any man who desires to do so may easily become ambidextrous," remarked Pittsburg Fleming. "All he has to do is to begin and systematically use his left instead of his right hand wherever it is possible." Young Fleming is an athlete and a clever boxer, and knows the importance of being able to use both hands with dexterity and force. "The ambidextrous man not only has the advantage over his opponent in sparring and all athletic sports, but he has a great advantage over others in games of skill, in almost any kind of business and is a better man all round. The one-handed man is a one-sided man. The muscles on the right side of the right-handed man become developed at the expense of the muscles of the other side; that shoulder becomes higher and the man grows lop-sided. To avoid this ought to be the effort of every youth, for then the muscular habit is formed. The difficulty may be corrected in some degree, however, by systematically using the left, or weaker hand and arm. Keep your keys and things in your left hand pocket, reach for things with your left hand, pick up weights with your left. You will be astonished to see how rapidly your hitherto neglected member can be brought into active and useful service."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Irving and Tennyson.

"Lord Tennyson was one of the greatest of men, and was one of the dearest and best of friends," said Mr. Henry Irving, in conversation with a newspaper representative. "One of the most touching incidents which I remember occurred while he was on his death-bed. You know that some of his plays lacked playing qualities. One night before his death he turned to his physician, Dr. Dabbs, who told me of the incident, and said, 'I suppose I shall never see Becket?' 'I fear not,' said the doctor. 'When do they produce Becket?' 'I think in May,' was the reply. 'They did not do me justice with "The Promise of May,"' said the dying poet, 'but Irving will do me justice in Becket.' Of that remark and confidence I am justly proud," concluded Mr. Irving.

"Did you not once suggest to Lord Tennyson that the life of Dante would be a favorable theme for a play?"

"Yes. He at first seemed pleased with the subject, but after thinking for a few moments, he said slowly, 'Yes, but where would you find a Dante to write it?' and he thereupon gave up the idea. I have no doubt that you have heard that his play of 'The Foresters' was originally written for us. I remember that when we had arranged about it I looked up everything relating to Robin Hood from a history to a 'penny dreadful' that I could find in London, and sent them to him. And a huge packet they made," concluded Mr. Irving, with a smile.—Westminster Budget.

CHAPTER I.

BRIDE AND BRIDEGROOM ELECT.

Firelight falling on soft velvet carpet, where white lily buds trail along azure ground, on chairs of white-polished wood that glitters like ivory, with puffy seats of blue satin; on blue and gilt panelled walls; on a wonderfully carved oaken ceiling; on sweeping draperies of blue satin and white lace; on half a dozen lovely pictures; on an open piano; and last of all, on the handsome, angry face of a girl who stands before it—Inez Catheron.

The month is August—the day the 29th—Miss Catheron has good reason to remember it to the last day of her life. But, whether the August sun blazes, or the January winds howl, the great rooms of Catheron Royals are ever chilly. So on the white-tiled hearth of the blue drawing-room this summer evening a coal fire flickers and falls, and the mistress of Catheron Royals stands before it, an angry flush burning deep red on either dusk cheek, an angry frown contracting her straight black brows.

The mistress of Catheron Royals,—the biggest, oldest, queerest, grandest place in all sunny Cheshire,—the slim, dark girl of nineteen, for three years past the bride-elect of Sir Victor Catheron, baronet, the last of this Saxon race and name, the lord of all these sunny acres, this noble Norman pile, the smiling village of Catheron below. The master of a stately park in Devon, a moor and "bothy" in the highlands, a villa on the Arno, a gem of a cottage in the Isle of Wight. "A darling of the gods," young, handsome, healthy; and best of all, with twenty thousand a year.

She is his bride-elect. In her dark way she is very handsome. She is to be married to Sir Victor early in the next month, and she is as much in love with him as it is at all possible to be. A fair fate surely. And yet while the August night shuts down, while the wind whistles in the trees, while the long fingers of the elm, just outside the window, tap in a ghostly way on the pane, she stands here, flushed, angry, impatient, and sullen, her handsome lips set in a tight, rigid line.

She is very dark at all times. Her cousin Victor tells her, laughingly, she is an absolute nigger when in one of her silent rages. She has jet-black hair, and big, brilliant, Spanish eyes. She is Spanish. Her dead mother was a Castilian, and that mother has left her her Spanish name, her beautiful, passionate Spanish eyes, her hot, passionate Spanish heart. In Old Castile Inez was born; and when in her tenth year her English father followed his wife to the grave, Inez came home to Catheron Royals, to reign there, a little, imperious hot-tempered Morisco princess ever since.

She did not come alone. A big boy of twelve, with a shock head of blue-black hair, two wild, glittering black eyes, and a diabolically handsome face, came with her. It was her only brother Juan, an imp incarnate from his cradle. He did not remain long. To the unspeakable relief of the neighborhood for miles around, he had vanished as suddenly as he had come, and for years was seen no more.

A Moorish Princess! It is her cousin and lover's favorite name for her, and it fits well. There is a certain barbaric splendor about her as she stands here in the firelight, in her trailing purple silk, in the cross of rubies and fine gold that burns on her bosom, in the yellow, perfumy rose in her hair, looking stately, and beautiful, and dreadfully out of temper.

The big, lonesome house is as still as a tomb. Outside the wind is rising, and the heavy patter, patter, of the rain-beats on the glass. That, and the light fall of the cinders in the polished grate, are the only sounds to be heard.

A clock on the mantel strikes seven. She has not stirred for nearly an hour, but she looks up now, her black eyes full of passionate anger, passionate impatience.

"Seven!" she says, in a suppressed sort of voice; "and he should have been here at six. What if he should defy me?—what if he does not come at all?"

She can remain still no longer. She walks across the room, and she walks as only Spanish women do. She draws back one of the window-curtains, and leans out into the night. The crushed sweetness of the rain-beaten roses floats up to her in the wet darkness. Nothing to be seen but the vague tossing of the trees, nothing to be heard but the soughing of the wind, nothing to be felt but the fast and still faster falling of the rain.

She lets the curtain fall, and returns to the fire.

There are two pictures hanging over the mantel—she looks up at them as she asks the question. One is the sweet, patient face of a woman of thirty; the other, the smiling face of a fair-haired, blue-eyed, good-looking lad. It is a very pleasant face; the blue eyes look at you so brightly, so frankly, the boyish mouth is so sweet-tempered and laughing that you smile back and fall in love with him at sight. It is Sir Victor and his late mother.

Miss Inez Catheron is in many respects an extraordinary young lady—Cheshire society has long ago decided that. They would have been more convinced of it than ever, could they have seen her turn now to Lady Catheron's portrait and appeal to it aloud in impassioned words:

"On his knees, by your dying bed, by your dying command, he vowed to love and cherish me always—as he did then. Let him take care how he trifles with that vow let him take care!"

She lifts one hand (on which rubies and diamonds flash) menacingly, then stops. Over the sweep of the storm, the rush of the rain, comes another sound—a sound she has been listening for, longing for, praying for—the rapid roll of carriage wheels up the drive. There can be but one visitor to Catheron Royals to-night, at this hour and in this storm—its master.

She stands still as a stone, white as a statute, waiting. She loves him; she has hungered and thirsted for the sound of his voice, the sight of his face, the clasp of his hand, all these weary, lonely months. In some way it is her life or death she is to take from his hands to-night. And now he is here.

She hears the great hall door open and close with a clang, she hears the steps of the master in the hall—a quick, assured tread she would have known among a thousand; she hears a voice—a hearty, pleasant, manly, English voice; a cherry laugh she remembers well.

"The Chief of Lara has returned again."

The quick, excitable blood leaps up from her heart to her face in a rosy rush that makes her lovely. The eyes light, the lips part—she takes a step forward, all anger, all fear, all neglect forgotten—a girl in love going to meet her lover. The door is flung wide by an impetuous hand, and wet and splashed, and tall and smiling, Sir Victor Catheron stands before her.

"My dearest Inez!"

He comes forward, puts his arm around her, and touches his blonde mustache to her flushed cheek.

"My dearest coz, I'm awfully glad to see you again, and looking so uncommonly well too." He puts up his eyeglass to make sure of this fact, then drops it. "Uncommonly well," he repeats; "give you my word I never saw you looking half a quarter so handsome before in my life. Ah! why can't we all be Moorish princesses, and wear purple silks and yellow roses?"

He flings himself into an easy-chair before the fire, throws back his blonde head, and stretches forth his boots to the blaze.

"An hour after time, am I not? But blame the railway people—don't blame me. Beastly sort of weather for the last week of August—cold as Iceland and raining cats and dogs; the very dickens of a storm, I can tell you."

He gave the fire a poke, the light leaps up and illumines his handsome face. He is very like his picture—a little older—a little worn-looking, and with man's "crowning glory," a mustache. The girl has moved a little away from him, the flush of "beauty's bright transcient glow" has died out of her face, the hard, angry look has come back. That careless kiss, that easy, cousinly embrace, have told their story. A moment ago her heart beat high with hope—to the day of her death it never beat like that again.

He doesn't look at her; he gazes at the fire instead, and talks with the hurry of a nervous man. The handsome face is a very effeminate face, and not even the light, carefully trained, carefully waxed mustache can hide the weak, irresolute mouth, the delicate, characterless chin. While he talks carelessly and quickly, while his slim white fingers loop and unloop his watch-chain, in the blue eyes fixed upon the fire there is an uneasy look of nervous fear. And into the keeping of this man the girl with the dark, powerful face has given her heart, her fate!

"It seems no end good to be at home again," Sir Victor Catheron says, as if afraid of that brief pause. "You've no idea, Inez, how uncommonly familiar and jolly this blue room, this red fire, looked a moment ago, as I stepped out of the darkness and rain. It brings back the old times—this used to be her favorite morning-room," he glanced at the mother's picture, "and summer and winter a fire always burned here, as now.

Keep Minard's Liniment in the House

She moves over to the mantel. It is very low; she leans one arm upon it, looks steadily at him, and speaks at last.

"I am glad Sir Victor Catheron can remember the old times, can still recall his mother, has a slight regard left for Catheron Royals, and am humbly grateful for his recollection of his gypsy cousin. From his conduct of late it was hardly to have been expected."

"It is coming," thinks Sir Victor, with an inward groan; "and, O Lord! what a row it is going to be. When Inez shuts her lips up in that tight line, and snaps her black eyes in that unpleasant way, I know to my cost, it means 'war to the knife.' I'll be routed with dreadful slaughter, and Inez's motto is ever, 'Woe to the conqueror!' Well, here goes!"

He looks up at her, a good-humored smile on his good-looking face.

"Humbly grateful for my recollection of you! My dear Inez, I don't know what you mean. As for my absence—"

"As for your absence," she interrupts, "you were to have been here, if your memory will serve you, on the first of June. It is now the close of August. Every day of that absence has been an added insult to me. Even now you would not have been here if I had not written you a letter you dare not neglect—sent a command you dare not disobey. You are here to-night because you dare not stay away."

Some of the bold blood of the stern old Saxon race from which he sprung is in his veins still. He looks at her full, still smiling.

"Dare not!" he repeats. "You use strong language, Inex. But then you have an excitable sort of nature, and were ever inclined to hyperbole; and it is a lady's privelege to talk."

"And a man's to act. But I begin to think Sir Victor Catheron is something less than a man. The Catheron blood has bred many an outlaw, many bitter, bad men, but to-day I begin to think it has bred something infinitely worse—a traitor and a coward!"

He half springs up, his eyes flashing, then falls back, looks at the fire again, and laughs.

"Meaning me?"

"Meaning you."

"Strong language once more—you assert your prerogative royally, my handsome cousin. From whom did you inherit that two-edged tongue of yours, Inez, I wonder? Your Castilian mother, surely; the women of our house were never shrews. And even you, my dear, may go a little too far. Will you drop vituperation and explain? It is well we should understand each other fully."

He has grown pale, though he speaks quietly, and his blue eyes gleam dangerously. He is always quiet when most angry.

"It is. And we shall understand each other before we part—be very sure of that. You shall learn what I have inherited from my Castilian mother. You shall learn whether you are to play fast and loose with me at your sovereign will. Does your excellent memory still serve you, or must I tell you what day the twenty-third of September is to be?"

He looks up at her, still pale, that smile on his lips, that gleam in his eyes.

"My memory serves me perfectly," he answers coolly; "it was to have been our wedding day."

Was to have been. As he speaks the words coldly, almost cruelly, as she looks in his face, the last trace of color leaves her own. The hot fire dies out of her eyes, an awful terror comes in its place. With all her heart, all her strength, she loves the man she so bitterly reproaches. It seems to her she can look back upon no time in which her love for him is not.

And now, it was to have been!

She turns so ghastly that he springs to his feet in alarm.

"Good heaven, Inez! you're not going to faint, are you? Don't! Here, take my chair, and for pity's sake don't look like that. I'm a wretch, a brute—what was it I said? Do sit down."

He has taken her in his arms. In the days that are gone he has been very fond, and a little afraid of his gipsy cousin. He is afraid still—horribly afraid, if the truth must be told, now that his momentary anger is gone.

All the scorn, all the defiance has died out of her voice when she speaks again. The great, solemn eyes transfix him with a look he cannot meet.

"Was to have been," she repeats, in a sort of whisper; "was to have been. Victor, does that mean it never is to be?"

He turns away, shame, remorse, fear in his averted face. He holds the back of the chair with one hand, she clings to the other as though it held her last hope in life.

"Take time," she says, in the same slow, whispering way. "I can wait. I have waited so long, what does a few minutes more matter now? But think well before you speak—there is more at stake than you know of. My whole future life hangs on your words. A woman's life. Have you ever thought what that implies? 'Was to have been,' you said Does that mean it never is to be?"

Still no reply. He holds the back of the chair, his face averted, a criminal before his judge.

"And while you think," she goes on, in that slow, sweet voice, "let me recall the past. Do you remember Victor, the day when I and Juan came here from Spain? Do you remember me? I recall you as plainly at this moment as though it were but yesterday—a little, flaxen-haired, blue-eyed boy in violet velvet, unlike any child I had ever seen before. I saw a woman with a face like an angel, who took me in her arms, and kissed me, and cried over me, for my father's sake. We grew up together, Victor, you and I, such happy, happy years, and I was sixteen, you twenty. And all that time you had my whole heart. Then came our first great sorrow, your mother's death."

She pauses a moment. Still he stands silent, but his left hand has gone up and covers his face.

"You remember that last night, Victor—the night she died. No need to ask you: whatever you may forget, you are not likely to forget that. We knelt together by her bedside. It was as this is, a stormy summer night. Outside, the rain beat and the wind blew; inside, the stillness of death was everywhere. We knelt alone in the dimly-lit room, side by side, to receive her last blessing—her dying wish. Victor, my cousin, do you recall what that wish was?"

She holds out her arms to him, all her heart breaking forth in the cry. But he will neither look nor stir.

"With her dying hands she joined ours, her dying eyes looking at you. With her dying lips she spoke to you: 'Inez is dearer to me than all the world, Victor, except you. She must never face the world alone. My son, you love her—promise me you will cherish and protect her always. She loves you as no one else ever will. Promise me, Victor, that in three years from to-night you will make her your wife.' These were her words. And you took her hand, covered it with tears and kisses, and promised.

"We buried her," Inez went on, "and we parted. You went up to Oxford; I went over to a Paris pensionnat. In the hour of our parting we went up together hand in hand to her room. We kissed the pillow where her dying head had lain; we knelt by her bedside as we had done that other night. You placed this ring upon my finger; sleeping or waking it has never left it since, and you repeated your vow, that that night three years, on the twenty-third of September, I should be your wife."

She lifts the betrothal ring to her lips, and kisses it. "Dear little ring," she says softly, "it has been my one comfort all her Paris, and a half dozen diamond rings on her plump, boneless fingers. A blue ribbon knots up the loose yellow hair, and you may search the big city from end to end, and find nothing fairer, fresher, sweeter than Ethel, Lady Catheron.

If ever a gentleman and a baronet had a fair and sufficient excuse for the folly of a low marriage, surely Sir Victor Catheron has it in this fairy wife—for it is a "low marriage" of the most heinous type. Just seventeen months ago, sauntering idly along the summer sands, looking listlessly at the summer sea, thinking drearily that this time next year his freedom would be over, and his cousin Inez his lawful owner and possessor, his eyes had fallen on that lovely blonde face—that wealth of shining hair, and for all time—aye, for eternity—his fate was fixed. The dark image of Inez as his wife faded out of his mind, never to return more.

The earthly name of this dazzling divinity in yellow ringlets and pink muslin was Ethel Margaretta—Dobb!

Dobb! It might have disenchanted a less rapturous adorer—it fell powerless on Sir Victor Catheron's infatuated ear.

It was at Margate this meeting took place—that most popular and most vulgar of all English watering-places; and the Cheshire baronet had looked just once at the peach-bloom face, the blue eyes of laughing light, the blushing, dimpling, seventeen-year-old face, and fallen in love at once and for ever.

He was a very impetuous young man, a very selfish and unstable young man, with whom, all his life, to wish was to have. He had been spoiled by a doting mother from his cradle, spoiled by obsequious servants, spoiled by Inez Catheron's boundless worship. And he wished for this "rose of the rose-bud garden of girls" as he had never wished for anything in his two-and-twenty years of life. As a man in a dream he went through that magic ceremony, "Miss Dobb, allow me to present my friend, Sir Victor Catheron," and they were free to look at each other, talk to each other, fall in love with each other, as much as they pleased. As in a dream he lingered by her side three golden hours, as in a dream he said, "Good afternoon," and walked back to his hotel smoking a cigar, the world glorified above and about him. As in a dream they told him she was the only daughter and heiress of a well-to-do London soap-boiler, and he did not wake.

She was the daughter of a soap-boiler. The paternal manufactory was in the grimiest part of the grimy metropolis; but, remarkable to say, she had as much innate pride, self-respect, and delicacy as though "all the blood of all the Howards" flowed in those blue veins.

He wasn't a bad sort of young fellow, as young fellows go, and frantically in love. There was but one question to ask, just eight days after this—"Will you be my wife?"—but one answer, of course—"Yes."

But one answer, of course! How would it be possible for a soap-boiler's daughter to refuse a baronet? And yet his heart had beaten with a fear that turned him dizzy and sick as he asked it; for she had shrunk away for one instant, frightened by his fiery wooing, and the sweet face had grown suddenly and startlingly pale. Is it not the rule that all maidens shall blush when their lovers ask the question of questions?

The rosy brightness, the smiles, the dimples, all faded out of this face, and a white look of sudden fear crossed it. The startled eyes had sunk from his eager, flushed face and looked over the wide sea. For fully five minutes she never spoke or stirred. To his dying day that hour was with him—his passionate love, his sick, horrible fear, his dizzy rapture, when she spoke at last, only one word—"yes." To his dying day he saw her as he saw her then, in her summery muslin dress, her gipsy hat, the pale, troubled look chasing the color from the drooping face.

But the answer was "yes." Was he not a baronet? Was she not a well trained English girl? And the ecstasy of pride, of joy, of that city soap-boiler's family, who shall paint? "Awake my muse" and—but, no! it passeth all telling. They bowed down before him (figuratively), this good British tradesman and his fat wife, and worshipped him. They burned incense at his shrine; they adored the ground he walked on; they snubbed their neighbors, and held their chins at an altitude never attained by the family of Dobb before. And in six weeks Miss Ethel Dobb became Lady Catheron.

It was the quietest, the dullest, the most secret of weddings—not a soul present except Papa and Mamma Dobb, a military swell in the grenadier guards—Pythias, at present, to Sir Victor Damon—the parson, and the pew-opener. He was madly in love, but he was ashamed of the family soap-boiling, and he was afraid of his cousin Inez.

He told them a vague story enough of

"At last! Oh, Victor, when do we go?"

"To-morrow, if you are able. The sooner the better."

He says it with rather a forced laugh. Her face clouds a little.

"And your cousin? Was she very angry?" she asked, wistfully; "very much surprised?"

"Well—yes—naturally, I am afraid she was both. We must make the best of that, however. To tell the truth, I had only one interview with her, and that of so particularly unpleasant a nature, that I left next morning. So then we start to-morrow? I'll just drop a line to Erroll to apprise him."

He catches hold of his wife's writing-table to wheel it near. By some clumsiness his foot catches in one of its spidery claws, and with a crash it topples over. Away goes the writing case, flying open and scattering the contents far and wide. The crash shock's baby's nerves, baby begins to cry, and the new-made mamma flies to her angel's side.

"I say!" Sir Victor cries. "Look hear! Awkward thing of me to do, eh, Ethel? Writing case broken too. Never mind I'll pick 'em up."

He goes down on his knees boyishly, and begins gathering them up. Letters envelopes, wax, seals, pens and pencils. He flings all in a heap in the broken case. Lady Catheron cooing to baby looks smilingly on. Suddenly he comes to a full stop.

Comes to a full stop, and holds something before him as though it were a snake. A very harmless snake apparently—the photograph of a young and handsome man. For fully a minute he gazes at it utterly aghast. "Good Heavens!" his wife hears him say.

Holding baby in her arms she glances at him. The back of the picture is toward her, but she recognizes it. Her face turns ashen gray—she moves round and bends it over baby.

"Ethel!" Sir Victor says, his voice stern, "what does this mean?"

"What does what mean? Hush h-h baby, darling. Not so loud, Victor, please. I want to get babe asleep."

"How comes Juan Catheron picture here?"

She catches her breath—the tone, in which Sir Victor speaks, is a tone not pleasant to hear. She is a thoroughly good little thing, but the best of little things (being women) are ergo dissemblers. For a second she dares not face him; then she comes bravely up to time and looks at him over her shoulder.

"Juan Catheron! Oh, to be sure. Is that picture here yet?" with a little laugh. "I thought I had lost it centuries ago." "Good Heaven!" she exclaims inwardly; "How could I have been such a fool!"

Sir Victor rises to his feet—a curious passing likeness to his dark cousin, Inez, on his fair blond face. "Then you know Juan Catheron. You! And you never told me."

"My dear Sir Victor," with a little pout, "don't be unreasonable. I should have something to do, if I put you on courant of all my acquaintances. I knew Mr. Catheron—slightly," with a gasp. Is there any crime in that?"

"Yes!" Sir Victor answers, in a voice that makes his wife jump and his son cry. "Yes—there is. I wouldn't own a dog—if Juan Catheron had owned him before me. To look at him, is pollution enough—to know him—disgrace!"

"Victor! Disgrace!"

"Disgrace, Ethel! He is one of the vilest, most profligate, most lost wretches that ever disgraced a good name. Ethel, I command you to tell me—was this man ever anything to you—friend—lover—what?"

"And if he has been—what then?" She rises and faces him proudly. "Am I to answer for his sins?"

"Yes—we all must answer more or less for those who are our friends. How come you to have his picture? What has he been to you? Not your lover—for Heaven's sake, Ethel, never that!"

"And why not? Mind!" she says, still facing him, her blue eyes aglitter, "I don't say that he was, but if he was—what then?"

"What then?" He is white to the lips with jealous rage and fear. "This then—you should never again be wife of mine!"

"Victor!" she puts out her hands as if to ward off a blow, "don't say that—oh, don't say that! And—and it isn't true—he never was a lover of mine—never, never!"

She burst out with the denial in passionate fear and trembling. In all her wedded life she has never seen him look, heard him speak like this, though she had seen him jealous—needlessly—often.

"He never was your lover? You are telling me the truth?"

"No, no—never! never, Victor—don't look like that! Oh what brought that wretched picture here! I knew him slightly—only that—and he did give me his photograph. How could I tell he

He tears up the wretched little mischief-making picture, and flings it out of the window with a look of disgust. Then they "kiss and make up," but the stab has been given, and will rankle. The folly of her past is doing its work, as all our follies past and present are pretty sure to do.

The English Railroad Guard.

The guard is found on the station platforms, where he looks at your ticket; opens and closes the door of the compartment, will try to see you well placed, according to your class, then hops into his van, and goes with the train on your journey. He is by no means the important person that the conductor is in the United States, for he has no opportunity to sit with the passengers. He never rises to the rank of captain, as all conductors do in our Southern States. He may become a Knight Templar, for all I know, but I never saw him with his waistcoat ablaze with the symbols of that order which so often decorate our own conductors. Doubtless in private life he is a man of influence in his neighborhood, but on duty he is a quiet servant, and his relations with the public are purely those of business. He is a tidy man in blue cloth uniform, with white metal buttons, and often wears a broad patent leather strap over one shoulder with white buckle and ornaments. He sometimes carries a small bag, presumably for such papers as he needs to have, and is provided with a green flag to wave to the engine man as a signal to start the train. Altogether he is a simple, efficient, and civil official, and just here is a striking contrast between the men of the two countries. On the English railroads one never sees the conductor or ticket-seller who scorns you if you ask a question, and gives the minimum of information with the maximum of brusqueness; one never sees the usher who stands in the gateway and bellows in articulate pride, then turns a quid in his cheek, and squirts tobacco juice into a corner.

Training a Husband.

My dear ladies, to whom I appeal, do not lose heart with the loss of your husband's attendance at meals. Next Sunday, when he is sure to be at home, expecting the usual dullness, have the place bright; and do as I have told you. You may be sure that his wanderings are none too happy without you—that at the club the last good-byes at midnight have been said with something approaching a stricken conscience—and as his cab jingles up to your door and he pays the cabman, he would give him five times his fare and shake hands rather than face your reproachful greeting, though you say nothing.

Never be reproachful, even with your eyes, when he comes home, because he stayed out so late; rather look pleased to see him come back; and next time he will be earlier. Remember he can't always be tied to your apron strings, and that he probably had friends even before he fell in love with you.

I know a man who got married. When he came back from his honeymoon he went out with half a dozen men to a music hall and to the club afterward. Some one chaffed him about staying out so late, a newly married man, and his reply was, "Old man, take my advice, and make it a good late night to begin with; I mean to have a late night once a month deliberately, and then there'll be no complaints." And he does—wisely—and they are very happy together, he and his wife.—Miss Mantalini, in Westminster Budget.

these years. Though all your conduct [illegible] your neglect for the last year and a half, I have looked at it, and know you would never break your pledged word to the living and the dead.

"I came home from school a year ago, you were not here to meet and welcome me. You never came. You fixed the first of June for your coming, and you broke your word. Do I tire you with all these details, Victor? But I must speak to-night. It will be for the last time—you will never give me cause again. Of the whispered slanders that have reached me I do not speak; I do not believe them. Weak you may be, fickle you may be, but you are a gentleman of loyal race and blood; you will keep your plighted troth. Oh, forgive me, Victor! Why do you make me say such things to you? I hate myself for them, but your neglect has driven me nearly wild. What have I done? Again she stretches forth her hands in eloquent appeal. "See I love you. What more can I say? I forgive all the past; I ask no questions. I believe nothing of the horrible stories they try to tell me. Only come back to me. If I lose you, I shall die."

Her face is transfigured as she speaks—her hands still stretched out.

"O Victor, come!" she says; "let the past be dead and forgotten. My darling, come back!"

But he shrinks away as those soft hands touch him, and pushes her off.

"Let me go!" he cries "don't touch me, Inez! It can never be. You don't know what you ask!"

He stands confronting her now, pale as herself, with eyes alight. She recoils like one who has recieved a blow.

"Can never be?" she repeats.

"Can never be!" he answers. "I am what you have called me, Inez, a traitor and a coward. I stand here perjured before God, and you, and my dead mother. It can never be. I can never marry you. I am married already!"

The blow has fallen—the horrible, brutal blow. She stands looking at him—she hardly seems to comprehend. There is a pause—the firelights flickers, they hear the rain lashing the windows, the soughing of the gale in the trees. Then Victor Catheron bursts forth:

"I don't ask you to forgive me—it is past all that. I make no excuse; the deed is done. I met her, and I loved her. She has been my wife for sixteen months, and—there is a son. Inez, don't look at me like that! I am a scoundrel, I know, but—"

He breaks down—the sight of her face unmans him. He turns away, his heart beating horribly thick. How long the ghastly pause that follows lasts he never knows—a century, counting by what he undergoes, Once, during that pause, he sees her fixed eyes turn slowly to his mother's picture—he hears low, strange-sounding words drop from her lips:

"He swore by your dying bed, and see how he keeps his oath!"

Then the life that seems to have died from her face flames back. Without speaking to him, without looking at him, she turns to leave the room. On the threshold she pauses and looks back.

"A wife and a son," she says, slowly and distinctly. "Sir Victor Catheron, fetch them home; I shall be glad to see them."

CHAPTER II.

WIFE AND HEIR.

In a very genteel lodging-house, in the very genteel neighborhood of Russell square, early in the afternoon of a September day, a young girl stands impatiently awaiting the return of Sir Victor Catheron. This girl is his wife.

It is a bright, sunny day—as sunny, at least, as a London day ever can make up its mind to be—and as the yellow, slanting rays pour in through the muslin curtains full on face and figure, you may search and find no flaw in either. It is a very lovely face, a very graceful, though petite figure. She is a blonde of the blondest type; her hair is like spun gold, and, wonderful to relate, no Yellow Wash: no Golden Fluid, has ever touched its shining abundance. Her eyes are bluer than the September sky over the Russell Square chimney-pots; her nose is neither aquiline nor Grecian, but it is very nice; her forehead is low, her mouth and chin "morsels for the gods." The little figure is deliciously rounded and ripe; in twenty years from now she may be a heavy British matron, with a yard and a half wide waste—at eighteen years old she is, in one word, perfection.

Her dress is perfection also. She wears a white India muslin, a marvel of delicate embroidery and exquisite texture, and a great deal of Valenciennes trimming. She has a pearl and turquoise star fastening her lace collar, pearl and turquois drops in for the present necessary, and nobody cross-questioned the baronet. That the parson was a parson, the marriage bona fide, his daughter "my lady," and himself the prospective grandfather of many baronets, was enough for the honest soap-boiler.

For the bride herself, she said little, in a shy, faltering little way. She was very fond of her dashing, high-born, impulsive lover, and very well content not to come into the full blaze and dazzle of high life just yet. If any other romance had ever figured in her simple life, the story was finished and done with, the book read and put away.

He took her to Switzerland, to Germany, to Southern France, keeping well out of the way of other tourists, and ten months followed—ten months of such exquisite, unalloyed bliss, as rarely falls to mortal man. Unalloyed, did I say? Well, not quite, since earth and heaven are two different places. In the dead of pale Southern nights, with the shine of the moon on his wife's lovely sleeping face; in the hot, brilliant moontide; in the sweet, green gloaming—Inez Catheron's black eyes came menacingly before him—the one bitter drop in his cup. All his life he had been a little afraid of her. He was something more than a little afraid of her now.

They returned. The commodious lodgings in Russell Square awaited him, and Sir Victor "went in" for domestic felicity in the parish of Bloomsbury, "on the quiet." Very much "on the quiet"—no theatre going, no opera, no visitors, and big Captain Jack Erroll, of the Second Grenadiers, his only guest. Four months of this sort of thing, and then—and then there was a son.

Lying in her lace-draped, satin-covered bed, looking at baby's fat little, funny little face, Ethel, Lady Catheron, began to think. She had time to think in her quiet and solitude. Monthly nurses and husbands being in the very nature of things antagonistic, and nurse being reigning potentate at present, the husband was banished. And Lady Catheron grew hot and indignant that the heir of Catheron Royals should have to be born in London lodgings, and the mistress of Catheron Royals live shut up like a nun, or a fair Rosamond in a bower.

"You have no relations living but your cousin, Victor," she said to him, more coldly than she had ever spoken in her life. "Are you master in your own house, or is she? Are you afraid of this Miss Catheron, who writes you such long letters (which I never see), that you dare not take your wife home?"

He had told her something of that other story necessarily—his former engagement to his cousin, Inez. Only something—not the bare ugly truth of his own treachery. The soap-boiler's daughter was more noble of soul than the baronet. Gentle as she was, she would have despised him thoroughly had she known the truth.

"This secrecy has lasted long enough," Lady Catheron said, a resolute-looking expression crossing her pretty, soft-cut mouth. "The time has come when you must speak. Don't make me think you are ashamed of me, or afraid of her. Take me home—it is my right; acknowledge your son—it is his. When there was only I, it did not so much matter—it is different now."

She lifted one of baby's dots of hands, and kissed it. And Sir Victor, his face hidden in the shadow of the curtains, his voice husky, made answer:

"You are right, Ethel—you always are. As soon as you both can travel, my wife and child shall come home with me to Catheron Royals."

Just three weeks later, as the August days were ending, came that last letter from Inez, commanding his return. His hour had come. He took the next morning train, and went forth to meet the woman he feared and had wronged.

* * * * *

The afternoon sun drops lower. If Sir Victor returns from Cheshire to-day, Lady Catheron knows he will be here in a few minutes. She looked at her watch a little wearily. The days are very long and lonely without him. Looks up again, her eyes alight. A hansom has dashed up to the door, and it is her husband who leaps out. Half a minute and he is in the room, and she is clasped in his arms.

"My darling!" he exclaims, and you need only hear the two words to tell how rapturously he loves his wife. "Let me look at you. Oh! as pale as ever, I see. Never mind! Cheshire air, sunshine, green fields, and new milk shall bring back your roses. And your son and heir, my lady, how is he?"

He bends over the pretty bassinet, with that absurd paternal look all very new fathers regard the first blessing, and his mustache tickles baby's innocent nose.

A flush comes into her face. She looks was the wretch you say he is—how could I think there would be any harm in taking a picture? He seemed nice, Victor. What did he ever do?"

"He seemed nice!" Sir Victor repeated bitterly, "and what did he ever do? What has he left undone, you had better ask. He has broken every command of the decalogue—every law human and divine. He is dead to us all—his sister included, and has been these seven years. Ethel, can I believe——"

"I have told you, Sir Victor. You will believe as you please," his wife answers, a little sullenly, turning away from him.

She understands him. His very jealousy and anger are born of his passionate love for her. To grieve her is torture to him, yet he grieves her often.

For a tradesman's daughter to marry a baronet may be but one remove from paradise; still it is a remove. And the serpent in Lady Catheron's Eden is the ugliest and most vicious of all serpents—jealousy. He has never shown his green eyes and obnoxious claws so palpably before, and as Sir Victor looks at her bending over her baby, his fierce paroxysm of jealousy gives way to a fierce paroxysm of love.

"Oh, Ethel, forgive me!" he says; "I did not mean to wound you, but the thought of that man—faugh!—But I am a fool to be jealous of you, my white lily. Kiss me forgive me—we'll throw this snake in the grass out of the window and forget it. Only I had not—had told me."

The Odessa correspondent of the Kingston Whig laid himself out to criticize actions of the old council of Ernestown, last week. He says that "the financial statement, which according to law should be issued on Dec 15th, was not placed in the hands of the electors until the Saturday before nomination day." Taking this as an example of his objections to the old council, his criticism cannot be styled of a very heavy calibre. The law only requires that the financial statement shall be submitted to the council on Dec. 15th, but as for the matter of placing them in the hands of the ratepayers, in the town of Napanee they are not usually distributed until the day of nomination, and we believe that this is quite in keeping with the statute made and provided.

Western Church Anniversary.

The Anniversary services of the Western Methodist church will be held on Sunday next. At the request of the official Board the pastor will conduct both services. At the morning service the subject will be "Sacrifice and Compensation." In the evening a song sermon will be given. Miss Canfield, of Belleville, a noted singer, will sing at both services Don't fail to hear her. Special contributions are asked for during the day. Let everybody assist in the matter. The Eastern church has kindly withdrawn its morning service so as to allow all to attend the Western church at that hour.

Make Your own Postal Cards.

After January 1st, the use of the private post card will be legal in Canada. With a one cent stamp attached, any ordinary card may be sent through the mail as well as the regular official postal card. The cards must be composed of ordinary cardboard, not thicker than the material used for the official card and the maximum size of the ordinary Canada postcard now in use The minimum size must not be less than three and a quarter inches by two and one quarter inches. The cards must not be folded. On the address side upon which the postage stamp used in pre-payment must be fixed, nothing may be written, printed or otherwise impressed except the name and address of the person to whom the card in delivered, and the name and address of the sender of the card and the words "private postal."

The Beautiful Children.

A friend of our acquaintance once remarked that he was "very much obliged to the ladies of America for having such beautiful children." He was right. American children are remarkably comely. Take a promenade in any of our parks of a fine day and you may see hosts of little cherubs being perambulated by nurses, or toddling or cavorting about on foot. One feels an almost irresistible inclination to hug them. If one could put one or two in one's vest pocket, and could deaden one's remorse of the grief of Mamma and run away fast enough—but no,—we will not suggest the possibility even to a childless old bachelor enamored of babies. That these beautiful little creatures should become feeble, weak, attenuated, haggard and woebegone is a most deplorable fact. Rescue must then be prompt or fatal consequences will ensue. Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites of Lime and Soda is an invigorant, the agreeable flavor of which specially adapts it to the use of families where there are children. All children object to taking medicine, and it is a most unpleasant task to force it upon them. Scott's Emulsion which is as agreeable as milk, excites no repugnance in the young or in delicate invalids generally. Physicians universally recommend it, and there is the highest authority for saying that it is the best nutrient of the feeble as well as specific for throat and lung disease in existence.

TOWN COUNCIL.

COUNCIL CHAMBER,
Jan. 7th, 1895.

The old council met in the new council chamber on Monday evening, Mayor Stevens in the chair, present, Carson Symington, Anderson, Ward, Leonard, McAlister, Lowry, Burns.

The minutes of last regular and special meetings were read and adopted.

The Treasurer's report was read and ordered to be filed.

The special committee appointed to confer with the Waterworks Co'y., reported that they had sent Dr. Ward, the chairman of the committee, to Watertown to confer personally with Messrs. Haines and Boyd. The Co'y. expressed a desire to make an offer to sell the works at a proper value, and said they would consult Mr. Hanover, who holds over half the stock, and submit the terms to the corporation through the council. The committee advised that no further action be taken in the matter at present, and that Dr. Ward be allowed his expenses. Adopted.

The question of a fire alarm was then brought up and on motion W. C. Scott addressed the council.

Scott advised the council to make haste slowly in the matter of putting in a fire alarm. It would be a good idea for the council to get expert independant testimony on the merits of the different systems as an uninated man could be easily deceived in dealing with these matters.

A letter from the council of Gananoque was then read, showing that the system of fire alarm there, which was similar to the one the Bell Telephone Co. proposed putting in in Napanee, was not working very satisfactorly.

Moved by Anderson and Burns that reeve Carson, deputy reeve Symington and Coun. Lowry be a committee to meet Mr. Scott and confer with him re a fire alarm system. Carried.

Mr. Scott assured the council that they need not trouble about the present fire alarm system, as it would be carried on till some arrangment was arrived at.

The thanks of the council were tendered to Mr. Scott for the information he had so kindly given.

On motion the usual allowance of $20 each was ordered to be paid the members of the retiring council for services on committees during the year.

A number of accounts were read and ordered to be paid or referred to the different committees.

Coun. Pringle entered.

An expression of regret was voiced by the council on the retirement of Couns. Anderson, Pringle, Potter, and Paul.

Messrs. Potter and Paul were absent but Messrs. Pringle and Anderson briefly replied to the kind expression.

Council adjourned, sine die.

Men's Boots, Boy's Boots, Ladie's Boots, Children's Boots included in Haines & Lockett's great remnant sale at 20 to 50 per cent reduction.

Mrs. Beaupiley, of Belleville, had her leg broken just above the ankle, on the 3rd. inst, by being thrown from a rig while the horse was running away.

Evensong at 7 p. m., when addresses on the creed will be continued.

Tamworth.

The ladies of Christ Church have reorganized their Guild and held their first meeting for work on Wednesday, 2nd inst., at the home of Miss Lockridge. They are prepared to take orders for all kinds of plain sewing, fancy work, knitting, etc.

Enterprise.

The Church of England congregation at this place, who have been worshipping for some time past in the Orange Hall, have purchased the old Methodist church and site and are repairing the building and arranging it for service. The site, which consists of two lots, is considered the best in the village and the congregation are looking forward to the erection of a more churchly edifice at some future day.

Parish of Camden.

Services Sunday next: St. Luke's, Camden East, 11 o'clock; St. John's, Newburgh, 3 o'clock; Holy Trinity, Yarker, 7 o'clock, Napanee Mills 10 30 a. m. Collections for Foreign Missions Epiphany appeal.—The congregation of St. John's, Newburgh, propose holding a grand entertainment, both afternoon and evening of Wednesday, Jan. 30th, in Finkle's Hall in aid of a bell for the church.

Adolphustown Parish.—Missionary Meetings.

On Sunday the 13th inst., D. V., the Rev. F. D. Woodcock, M. A., and the Rev. A. L. Gean, P. D., will hold Missionary Meetings in St. Paul's church, Sandhurst, at 11 o'clock; in St. Alban's, Adolphustown, at 3 o'clock; and in St Jude's, Gosport, at 7 o'clock. Collection for the Mission Fund at every meeting.

Union Church.

There will be no English church service in this church next Sunday on account of the missionary meeting in Gosport, to which all are invited.

A Sad Death.

It is our sad duty to chronicle the demise of Rita Vanslyck, wife of Mr. Frank M. Denyes, of Odessa, which sad event occurred on Tuesday 8th inst. Deceased was 28 years of age and much esteemed and respected for her many endearing qualities. She was a good christian lady and a consistent member of the Methodist church, having become a member of that body at the early age of ten years. She leaves a husband and two children, an infant 6 days old, and a boy two years of age. The great heart of the community goes out to Mr. Denyes in his sad affliction. The funeral took place on Thursday to the Morven cemetry.

A Good Man Gone.

On New Year's day the spirit of Robert Patterson took its flight and a noble soul passed over to the Great Divide. He was fifty-six years of age, born and brought up on Amherst Island, and as a fitting finale his last breath was drawn in the place in which he first saw the light of day. In the days of the old 48th Batt. he served as captain of No. 4 company, and later on was appointed major. In camp he was a general favorite, not only with his own company, but with the whole battalion, and the intelligence of his death will be received with deep regret by all who knew him. On Amherst Island he was honored and revered by all classes, and was a school trustee where he lived, and also faithfully served the township for some years in the capacity of Reeve, In 1892 he was elected warden of Lennox and Addington, and his appointment gave general satisfaction to all. He was a staunch reformer in politics, and did yeoman services for the grand old cause of Liberalism. In religion he was a faithful member of the Presbyterian church. A widow and seven children are left to mourn the loss of a faithful husband and loving father. His mother, and old lady who has seen the ups and downs of life for over ninety years, still survives and mourns the loss of her only son. The funeral, which was the largest ever seen on the island, took place on Thursday Jan. 3rd, to the Presbyterian church, where the Rev. J. Cumberland conducted the service, after which all that was mortal of Robert Patterson was consigned to the Glenwood vault to await burial.

return to town and wish him every success.

The New Council Chamber.

The new council chamber in the basement of the town hall is a credit to Napanee. It is comfortable and commodious, handsomely painted, lighted by gas and heated by hot air. Our civic fathers are to be complimented on their handsome new chamber, and much praise is due to ex-Councillor Thos. E Anderson, for the able manner in which the work was conducted.

Mrs. Soper, of Belleville, died in that city on the 3rd inst., at the advanced age of 90 years.

Miss Belle Spooner has been engaged as teacher for Tichborne school this year.

Miss Gertrude Mills, of Wilton, has been engaged as teacher of Victoria school for 1895.

Mrs. Hannah M. Cochrane, relict of the late Rev. John Cochrane, the second rector of St. Thomas' church, Belleville, died at Huff's Island on Sunday morning. Deceased was 85 years of age, and came of one of the oldest families in the Bay of Quinte District—the Meyers', whose early home was at Trenton.

West Algoma bye election will take place on the 29th, inst., and that for Kingston on the 28th.

A very pleasant time was spent on New Year's night at the residence of Mrs. I. Holland, Wooler, the occasion being the marriage of their niece, Miss Mary I. Palmer, to M. W. W. Herrington. The ceremony was performed by Rev. H. Thomas in the presence of about 150 friends. The happy couple were the recipients of many valuable presents. They are spending their honeymoon with relatives in Napanee and vicinity.

A bridge is needed to span the river at Howe Island. Father O'Gorman, could not cross the river to celebrate mass on a recent Sunday, owing to the lack of one.

Miss Etta Sutton, daughter of Cyrus Sutton, of Colebrook, died last week, after an illness of one week's duration.

The Sidney Crossing Mission Band presented the City Mission, Belleville, with a beautiful, crayon autograph quilt on Friday eve.

Early on Thursday morning, Jan. 3rd, the home of J. K. McCaragar, about two miles east of Belleville, on the Kingston Road, was totally destroyed by fire. The inmates were asleep when the fire broke out, and when the fire was discovered it was with difficulty they made their escape. It was a substantial two story brick building. It is thought the fire originated from a grate in which soft coal was burned. There is an insurance of $1,800 on the contents, and a small insurance on the building.

A hockey club was organized in Picton on Friday evening last.

High Constable Johnston arrested Minnie Blakely on the 3rd, inst., at Keller,s Bridge, in Madoc township, on a charge of bigamy and prostitution. She was married to Sanford Blakely in December, 1884, and Paul Deshane in October, 1885. He also arrested her son aged eight years, under the act for protection of children.

John Parsons has been arrested at Medicine Hat on a charge of bigamy. The accused has been living at Medicine Hat for some time, and on October 16 was married to Lucy Harrison. It transpires that Parsons was married in Trenton, in 1884, and has a wife and three children living there.

Married, at the Manse, Picton, on January 2nd, 1895, by the Rev. Donald G. MacPhail, Miss Maud Comer, of Picton, to Robt. Wm. Davidson, of Fredericksburgh.

Married, on Tuesday 1st inst, at the residence of the bride's father, Picton, by the Rev. T. M. Campbell, John Sherman Fox, to Florence, daughter of W. R. Dingman, Esq, all of Picton.

At the First Methodist Parsonage, Picton, on Wednesday the 2nd. inst, Andrew D. McFarland, of Picton, was married to Jeunie, daughter of Mr. William Foster, of Hallowell.

On the 24th, ult, at the bride's father by the Rev. O. R. Lambly, M. A., Henry A Martin, of Yarker, and Emma T. Snider, of Hallowell, were united in wedlock.

Finley, of Flinton; Harding of Coe Hill; Gardner, of Bannockburn; Shaw, of Queensboro; Paine, of Tweed, and Mrs. Plunkett, of Madoc, have each been fined $25 and costs, by Ont. College of Physicians and Surge... [illegible] medicine.

COUNTY COUNCIL

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

A communication from the Ontario Rifle Association was read asking for a donation towards prize list. The council felt disposed to aid the Association, but the Warden ruled that any sum voted would be a special grant, and therefore illegal.

A request made from the Bureau of Industries, by letter, for a return of all debts and liabilities of the county, of whatever nature, up to 31st day of December last. The treasurer was instructed to make out the report.

ACCOUNTS.

Napanee Express, rolls, etc., $135.00; Gibbard Furniture Co'y, $12 95; Beaver, $18.50; W. G Wilson, $13.05; Irvine Parks, postage, etc., $3.60.

Mr. Carscallen presented the first report of County Property Committee, recommending payment of accounts submitted.

Mr Filson presented first report of Road and Bridge Committee recommending no action with regard to the Good Roads Association, and that the application from the county of Grey re railway crossings be endorsed, and this council sign the petition to the legislature.

A grant of $400 to the poor schools in the back country was recommended.

An inquiry as to where the money was elicited the fact that a large number of schools in the rear of the county were dependent upon this grant, and the amount given by the legislature, which is $800.

Mr. Sills presented first report of Education and Printing Committee.

Further consideration of the reports was deferred, as a large deputation was in attendance to interview the council on the question of establishing a poor house for the county.

On motion it was resolved that the deputation be heard.

Among those who addressed the council and urged the establishment of some place to take care of the aged and infirm poor, were the following: the Mayor, Police Magistrate Daly, Rev. McDiarmid, Rev. A. Jarvis, W. S. Herrington, Mrs. Grange and A. R. Davis.

The deputation impressed upon the council in feeling and appropriate terms the moral necessity of establishing some place of refuge for the sick, infirm, poor people of the county.

After the deputation had withdrawn business was resumed by considering the grant to poor schools. Some councillors thought a grant of $300 should be made, while others were in favor of a grant of $400. On motion a grant of $400 was made.

Mr. Oliver presented the first report of the Finance Committee.

Moved by Thos. Symington and B. E. Aylesworth that the Legislature of Ontario be memorialized to appoint auditors, being duly qualified and certified accountants

Mr. Symington said in support of the motion, that this method would insure an audit that could be sworn to, and would probably cost no more than at present. The idea was a new one, and was brought forth so that it might be looked over. Counties might be grouped for efficient men appointed for a great saving expense while ensuring efficiency.

On motion the warden of last year, the Chairman of the Finance Committee were ordered a day's pay and mileage for attending to debenture sale.

FRIDAY MORNING.

An invitaion was sent to the Warden by A. R. Davis, and read by the clerk to the council, to be present on the market square at 1.30 o'clock to see a simple test of a method for taking levels, which could be used by any farmer.

On motion the invitation was accepted.

Moved by I. F. Aylesworth and Amey that the council go into a committee of the whole to read a by law to repeal by-laws Nos. 60 and 139. Carried.

Council went into committee of the whole, with I. F. Aylesworth in the chair by-law be read again this day six months. Carried.

These by-laws referred to the levying of interest on unpaid county assessments. As the by-law was defeated municipalities have to pay interest on unpaid county rates.

John C. Carscallen presented the following report :

GENTLEMEN,—In accordance with the report of the Education and Printing Committee, adopted by the council at its last session, and resolution passed at said session, I have caused the question of county grants to the Newburgh and Napanee High Schools to be brought before His Honor Judge Wilkison, pursuant to the provisions of High School Act 1891, and I beg to report progress to date as follows :

1st—I retained the services of Mr. Wilson, solicitor, in each case on behalf of the county and he has taken the necessary steps to bring the matter before His Honor.

2nd—I associated with myself in the prosecution of the matters the chairman of the Education and Printing Committee for 1894, Mr. E. H. Sills.

3rd—In the case of Newburgh and County the evidence has all been put in and case partly agreed, the final argument having deferred until after the evidence in case of Napanee and county is completed when the legal argument in both cases will be made.

4th—Owing to previous engagement of His Honor, the judge, the case of the County and Napanee Board of Education could not be completed, and there has only been a preliminary hearing thereon, but matters are in shape for speedily closing the case so soon as an appointment can be obtained from His Honor.

Respectfully submitted,

J. C. CARSCALLEN,

Received and adopted.

Moved by Riley and Oliver that the Warden and Messrs. Carscallen and Sills be a committee to carry through the arbitrations pending between the County and Napanee and Newburgh Boards of Education, and upon decisions being given by His Honor Judge Wilkison that the said committee do certify the amounts to be paid by the County for costs, and upon said certificate the warden and clerk do give orders on the Treasurer for said amounts. Carried.

On motion the chairman of County Property Committee was authorized to purchase fuel for county purposes, and give orders on the Treasurer, signed by the clerk and warden, in payment of same.

Moved by Chalmers and Sills that, whereas there is a feeling throughout the county and the province that it is expedient to lessen the number of members of the county council, therefore be it resolved by this council that a petition be sent to the Ontario Legislature, signed by the warden and the clerk, praying for an amendment to the Municipal Act to the effect that each municipality send one representative only to the county council.

Mr. Chalmers spoke in support of the motion urging that, as county roads and bridges were now done away with, there was really very little chance of any municipality obtaining any overdue advantage.

Mr. I. F. Aylesworth said he could not vote for this, as he could not go back on representation by population. If the motion was amended so as to group some of the smaller municipalities and bring the representation somewhere equal he would be in favor of the motion.

Mr. Filson said the motion should be killed now and here, as the motion would not be fair to the larger municipalities. He held every member present was earning his pay. They were here to look after the interests of the ratepayers, and he thought they were all doing that. There would be great difficulty in arranging who should represent grouped municipalities. The move would lead to rings being formed, and a few men would run this county. The present was the only arrangement which gave all the ratepayers a fair representation, and any saving which could be effected by changing it would be more than offset by other disadvantages.

Mr. Oliver expressed himself as in favor of one man from each municipality, and commended the young members for bringing the motion forward, so that it might be discussed.

Mr. Anderson could not vote for the motion, but the council might meet a day or two later, and still get through by Saturday.

Mr. Carscallen was not in favor of meeting at a later day. As it was some things were hurried through too fast. If the council could do the business in less time than at present an adjournment should be had before Saturday.

The motion was lost.

NAYS—Amey, I. F. Aylsworth, B. E. Aylsworth, Anderson, Carson, Davis, Filson, Griffith, Lockridge, Paul, Riley, Shier, Symington, Thomson, Wilde.

Moved by Filson and Kimmerly that a special committee be appointed, to be composed of the Warden, I. F. Aylsworth, Wilde, Thomson and the mover, to select a suitable place for a county poor house, have plans, specifications, and estimates of probable cost prepared, and report at the June session of this council. Ordered laid on table until the afternoon.

Adjourned.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

The sitting commenced with a discussion of the poor house question.

Mr. Filson said it would probably be expected of him to speak in favor of his motion, but he would rather speak after the matter had been discussed by others.

Mr. Symington spoke in favor of the motion, and advocated that the cost to the county for the poor would be no more than at present. Private aid would be forthcoming in aiding the project.

Mr. I. F. Aylsworth spoke against the motion; but was willing a plebiscite of the county should be taken on the question.

Mr. Filson said he was in favor of a plebiscite if it was taken fairly. If a square, fair vote of the people could be taken he would be satisfied. As to the cost and the location of the building he felt was sure the townspeople of Napanee would subscribe half the cost of building, even if it was located at Odessa. It was not a question to benefit Napanee that was being advocated. What was wanted was a House of Refuge for the poor, and the people of Napanee did not care where it was located.

Mr. Chalmers, as one of the committee of last year on the poor house scheme, said on making enquiry around as to the cost found one place where $10,000 had been expended for buildings and grounds, and the capacityof this was about what this county would need. He was in favor of either building a poor house by the county or by private subscription, but not for a combination. He was not in favor of any more committes being appointed, and was therefore against the motion.

Mr. Lane said the back country was, he thought, against the poor house scheme, but he would try and learn what the people wanted if the matter was laid over until June.

Mr. Riley said he had no doubt the Township of Camden was against the scheme.

Mr. Oliver said there was not a shadow of a doubt as to what humanity demanded. He did not know that the question had been discussed much in Richmond. He thought the county should obtain specifications and learn what the cost would be. If there was any feasible way of getting on to the right road for taking care of the poor, the county should not hesitate to do what humanity demands.

Mr. Alexander corroborated what the reeve of Richmond said. Although Richmond spent about $600 a year on poor he was free to admit that some of them were very poorly provided for. He thought they should be better kept in a house of refuge.

Mr. Sills, speaking for North Fredericksburgh said $40 a year would pay their poor account. But they were a provident, careful lot of people. He did not think twenty-five men could be found in N. Fredericksburgh who would vote for a poor house.

Mr. Wilde expressed himself as against the poor house, as he thought the township of Camden would rather keep their own poor. At the same time he thought a poor house would soon become a necessity.

Mr. Thomson said Newburgh had no poor, but he was in favor of a poor house.

Mr. Aylsworth said if help were obtained to cover the first expense, and something of that kind were added to the motion, he would be in favor of it.

Mr. Amey expressed himself as opposed to a poor house at the present time.

The motion was put and declared lost.

THE WARDEN'S SUPPER.

The Warden's Supper at the Campbell House on Friday evening of last week was a highly successful affair and one that will go down in the archives of municipal history as one of the most profitable and enjoyable of a long list of social gatherings of a similar character. For years it has been the custom of the Wardens of Lennox & Addington to hold inaugural dinners and let us hope this pleasant social function will never be dispensed with.

The gathering that sat down to the toothsome edibles prepared by Mine Host Hugh Milling was a representative one of the intelligence and worth of town and county, and everything past off as "merry as a marriage bell." The menu provided was fully up to the usual high standard of excellence that has given the Campbell House such a good name throughout the country, and the tables were elaborately and tastefully decorated.

In electing Mr. John Carson to the Warden's chair of the county of Lennox & Addington a man well qualified to fill the position has been selected. Mr Carson has personal ability, business experience and good judgment that eminently fit him for the discharge of the duties of the office. He has had many years experience in municipal affairs which has given him possession of a large fund of information pertaining to procedure in the county council, and he is possessed of sufficient firmness of character to see that the rules and regulations governing this body will be strictly adhered to. With such a man at the head of affairs the county's business is sure to receive careful, accurate and sound supervision.

When Mr. Carson sets out to do a thing he does it well and it would be hard to suggest where an improvement could be made in the manner in which the supper was conducted.

After due justice had been done to the good things provided, the chairman, Mr. Fred Ruttan, who filled the position with great acceptance called the meeting to order. He said all who would be called upon to speak had been notified beforehand. He then proposed the toast to "The Queen" which was nobly responded to by the guests singing heartily God Save the Queen. Mr. S. C. Warner, did the honors of the vice-chair and by his witty remarks in introducing the various speakers added considerably to the enjoyment of the evening.

Before asking them to drink to the toast of "our host" the chairman referred to the applicability of the name "Honest John" with which the warden had been dubbed. He could do no better than refer them to the experience of an orange friend "who had found a lawyer and an honest man.' We had a Warden and an honest man.

Our Host—"Never will the sun arise on such another."

Warden Carson, in rising to reply to the toast, thanked them for the hearty manner in which they had responded to his invitation. He felt proud to have them with him as his guests and as there was a long programme to be gone through with he would not inflict a speech upon them. He felt that his lot had fallen in pleasant places. He had been returned to the council on every occasion, except two, by acclamation, and now they had done him the honor of electing him Warden by acclamation. Again thanking them for responding to his invitation, the Warden resumed his seat amid great applause.

Mr. Jewell then sang "The Maple Leaf for ever" the assemblege joining in the chorus.

"Our Law Makers,"—"Age cannot wither, nor custom stale her infinite variety."—Responded to by Uriah Wilson, M. P.

Mr. Wilson congratulated the warden on the high position to which he had attained. The name Honest John was no misnomer. The ratepayers of Napanee had recognized this and had returned him as their representative for a good many years, and now the County Council had elected him their warden by acclamation. Mr. Wilson could be received in any of the colleges thirty five years ago. Referring to the warden, Mr. Preston said, he had won his present position by his character and administrative ability and had set an example for others to look up to and follow. He thought that the highest compliment that could be paid him, was given him when he was called Honest John.

Mr. Henry said, if it would not be thought too formal, or too personal he would refer to about thirty five years ago when Warden Carson was pursuing his education in Madden's school house down the York road. From there he served his apprenticeship, in harnessmaking, with Mr Coates. He had not been favored as some boys have been, but had made the best of his opportunities. He could say that he had never heard of one disreputable word from our present warden. Although not blessed with exceptionable ability he had won his way to the top. Mr. Henry said that the educational interests were dear to him and it was gently hinted that they were somewhat dear to some of the ratepayers. He spoke eloquently of our advanced educational facilities and advantages and said that it was not children of the upper ten who were coming to the front in education, but of those whose parents have to labor for their days bread. He regretted that there were a great many people who seemed to forget that there was as much scope for the excercise of their intelligence on the farm as in any other branch of industry. There was something loose when boys with a little education thought it beneath their dignity to work on the farm. Nations had fallen by a swarm of the farmers to the cities. Agriculture was the root of our success, and when it was neglected the axe was laid to the root of the tree. But he was forgetting that brevity was the soul of wit and as a famous American Orator once said: "There is not a man, woman or child, who has reached the age of fifty years, who has not heard it reverberating down the corridors of time for centuries."

W. F. Hall congratulated the warden on the position he had attained. He had been elected to this honorable position for his honesty of character and sterling integrity. Mr. Hall here went into figures to show the cost, to the average ratepayer in town and county, of maintaing our Collegiate Institute. Putting the average assessed value of the ratepayers of Napanee at $500, it cost the average ratepayer $1.29 for maintaining, and 92c. cost of construction a total of $2.21 a year for the benefits secured from the Collegiate Institute. In the county, putting the average assessed value of a 100 acre farm at $2.500, it cost the average farmer $1 a year to support the Collegiate Institute.

Messrs Jewell and Daly rendered an excellent duett and responded to a hearty encore.

"The County Council" "Pleasure and action make the hours seem short."—Responded to by ex-wardens Carscallen, Filson; Reeves, B. E. Aylsworth, W. W Lane, Atkinson Wilde, J. F. Chalmers, I. F. Aylsworth.

Ex-Warden Carscallen was glad to do honor to our present Warden. Mr. Carson had not to fight his way in elections very much but he (Mr. Carscallen) had been a member of the council for 20 years and had always fought for the position. It was a pleasure to him to be connected with Municipal institutions.

Ex-Warden Filson supposed he would have to keep his feet for half an hour to make amends for the brevity of Mr Carscallen's speech. If he had he would simply stand up and let them look at him as all the speech had been knocked out of him in the debate that afternoon. He would have to inform the chairman that he proved remiss in his duty, as, notwithstanding his promise, he had not been notified that he was to speak. A remark that fell from the lips of Mr. Hall had set him thinking about that terrible Newburgh High School. He had taken the part of the school, from his contrary nature, he supposed, because the other fellow had undertaken to show how the shool was robbing the people. This year he had asked, not his opponent—for he had none, thank 22 years and there was no place or subject he was more interested in. He congratulated the Warden on having attained the position with apparently such little effort. He referred to Napanee's advanced facilities. "View it commercially," he said, "or otherwise, you can't but think well of it."

Mr. Symington said that if he wished to practice public speaking the row of empty seats that greeted him would not be very encouraging. At this late hour in the evening a man would need to be either very witty or very wise in order to hold and interest his audience. He congratulated the Warden on the position to which he had attained, but he didn't know who to congratulate the most, Mr. Carson or the ones over whom he presided. His fairness, calculating, cool judgment made him an ideal chairman. He was going to talk on a new subject, a subject that should be the nearest our heart—our home. Mr. Symington spoke eloquently of the need of home training, as it was there the character was shaped, and wound up an interesting address by a brief reference to the Poor House question.

Mr. Morden said it afforded him a good deal of gratification to be present at the Warden's inaugural dinner. Mr. Carson had gone on quietly waiting his opportunity. While never surprising anyone by any brilliant manœuvre he had gradually worked his way up to the position without much effort on his part. An evidence that the place was waiting for the man. Mr. Morden here became reminiscent, and recalled the days of Bidwell and Perry, and referred to Napanee when the land occupied by the palatial residence of Ald. Lowry was enclosed by a snake fence and Dundas street south only boasted of a few houses and a board fence where the loafing boys used to congregate. Mr. Morden's address was very interesting and wound up with a reference to our schools in which the speaker contrasted the facilities of the schools of Napanee with those of his school boy days when the school seats were composed of slabs hoisted up good and high so that the scholars feet came within three or four inches of reaching the floor. He said that one could not help but be struck with the well dressed, intelligent and good looking children that frequented our schools. In this respect Napanee would compare more than favorably with any town in the Province. He could say this without fear of being accused of partiality as none of them belonged to him.

Messrs. Henwood, Davis and Daly rendered an excellent trio.

"Our County Officials."—"Hope to joy is little less in joy than hope enjoyed"—Responded to by Mr. Gibson who at this early hour in the morning would not inflict a speech on them. The county officials would bear inspection and compare favorably with the men in other branches of the public services.

"Arts and Agriculture."—"Sir, I am a true laborer; I earn that I get, get that I wear, owe no man hate, envy no man's happiness"—Responded to by W. H. Baker and I. Parks.

Mr. Baker said the Warden was a gentleman who he respected very much and under hir rulings the business of the council would be carried on properly. He referred briefly to agriculture and showed how the interests of the country were largely dependant on it.

Mr. Parks would not make a speech. He knew of one art that Mr. Carson was not overly proficient in. He and the Warden had been out on a little hunt last fall and he found out that the Warden was not a good hand in the art of shooting.

"The Ladies."—"She is strange—so strange—so strange!" "Gentle thou art and therefore to be won."—Responded to by J. F. Chalmers, who said he would ever bless the ladies as it was the vote of one, and the only one in the township that voted, that tied the election in Adolphustown, thereby causing his election.

Mr E. Sills wished to know if there was going to be another "tie" in connection with that vote.

God Save the Queen, sang with hearty goodwill, brought a very enjoyable evening to a close.

NAYS—Amey, I. F. Aylsworth, Carscallen Chalmers, Davis, Griffith, Lockridge, Paul, Sills, Shier, Wilde.

Mr. Carscallen presented the second report of County Property, recommending Mr. Anderson's tender for meat, and Mrs. Baker's tender for bread and potatoes. Report adopted,

A motion to accept the plans and specifications of a poor house from A. R. Davis was lost.

The special committee re Hay Bay ferry reported. Council went into committee of the whole on the report, Mr. Riley in the chair.

Considerable discussion took place as to this ferry. Some members of the council were of the opinion that a new ferry could be established. The clerk gave an opinion that the ferry already established, that it could not be done away with, but could be regulated.

The report was referred back to the committee.

A motion was made to appoint Messrs. Lane, Kimmerly and Paul a deputation to wait on the local government on behalf of a grant towards the expenditure on colonization roads.

Adjourned.

SATURDAY MORNING.

The question of sending a deputation to Toronto to advocate grants to colonization roads in the back townships was taken up.

The yeas and nays were taken. Yeas, 8, nays, 11.

The committee re Hay Bay reported, recommending no action.

The committee re heating the gaol reported, asking further time, and that a deputation be appointed to visit and examine the system in use in Frontenac gaol. Laid over until the June session.

On motion Wm. Lane, Reeve of Denbigh, was appointed a delegation to interview the local government on behalf of a grant towards the colonization roads in the county.

Moved by Filson and Amey that the question of a county house of refuge be made a question to be voted on at the municipal elections in 1896.

The motion was laid over for consideration at the June session.

Moved by Oliver and Sills that the auditors be asked to report on a system of banking the funds of the county, and monthly cheques for current expenses be given treasurer. Carried.

Mr. Carscallen presented a report of the committee on the treasurer's bonds, asking further time. Carried.

On motion John Cheetham was ordered paid $1 50 per day for attendance during the sessions.

On motion Ex-Warden Carscallen was ordered paid $5.40 for two day's work in changing securities.

There was considerable discussion as to whether the council should meet on Wednesday or Tuesday in June. Eventually a motion carried to meet on the first Tuesday in June.

Adjourned.

The Ancient Betrothal Ring.

The ancients wore the betrothal ring as now, on the next least finger of the left hand. Many reasons are assigned for this, as the erroneous idea that a vein or nerve went direct to the heart, and therefore the outward sign of matrimony should be placed in connection with the seat of life; the left hand is a sign of inferiority or subjection; the left hand is less employed than the right, and the finger next least the best protected. At one time it was the custom to place the wedding ring on the right hand of the bride. The Anglo-Saxon bridegroom at the betrothal gave a wed or pledge, and a ring was placed on the maiden's right hand, where it remained till marriage and was then transferred to the left.—Philadelphia Times.

A Wise Servant.

"Suppose," said the lady—"now only suppose, understand—that you were carrying a piece of steak from the kitchen, and by accident should let it slip from the plate to the floor, what would you do in such a case?"

The girl looked the lady square in the eye for a moment before asking:

"Is it a private family or are there boarders?"

"Boarders," answered the lady.

"Pick it up and put it back on the plate," firmly replied the girl. She was engaged.

their warden by acclamation. Mr. Wilson felt particularly embarrassed in addressing them. The Globe had announced that in a few weeks there would be a general election, and he would not like to say anything that might lose him the support of the Patrons, Reformers or Conservatives present. Referring to our law makers, the recent speeches at Montreal by Hon. Mr. Laurier, Sir. Oliver Mowat and Wm. Patterson demonstrated that they were creditable representives of one side of the house, while on the other side we had men like the late Sir John A. McDonald, Mr. Foster and Dr. Montague. But the social business men in Parliament were the ones that gave the country good services. Although not not known to the general public those men played a more important part in shaping useful Legislation than the men who were on their feet all the time. He was afraid he would say something that would not be palatable, and as the Globe has informed us that we were near another election he had better be careful. He was sorry we were not going to have another session, as we need the indemnity you know. He congratulated the warden on having attained the position with apparently so little effort. He knew something of the difficulty of getting elected, but if he got the support of the whole of the three parties he had spoken of, it would be tolerably safe this time.

Mr. A. L. Morden favored the guests with a song, "An Elephant on his hands," with guitar accompaniment, and received an enthusiastic encore.

Our Educational Institutions. "Many days will see her, and yet no day without a deed to crown it."—responded to by Mr. Burrows, I. P. S., D. H. Preston, Q. C., T. M. Henry, W. F. Hall.

Inspector Burrows extended his congratulations to the warden. He was sincerely glad at the marked success that had attended his career. He also had worthy associates in the county council. Since the county council were all present he wished to extend to them his hearty thanks for the $400 they had granted in aid of the poor schools, he did not mean that the schools were poor, but that they needed extraneous aid to keep them going. He did not know of a single grant that the county council had made that did so much good as the $400 granted to those schools. Those people in the back township were poor, and without aid would be unable to keep up their schools. They were now in a position to get a fair education, and as the government granted $1.000 towards them, this with the $400 from the county would make them pretty happy. Athough they have not the educational advantages that we in the front possess, they are fairly well fixed and it was a proud thing to say that in Canada the poorest in our land may get a fair mental equipment. Mr. Burrows referred to the backward condition of education in this county 24 years ago, and to the poor and miserable equipments in the schools then, even in the wealthy neighborhoods. Two years after he had been appointed inspector 50 schools had been erected in the county. Mr. Burrows said the teachers make the schools. He referred to the wonderful improvement in the status of the teachers—not only secular but moral. He showed that we should combat ignorance as it had been made powerful by granting it legislative functions. He referred to the "tyranny of universal suffrage" and how demagouges could use the ignorant to accomplish their own selfish purposes. He thanked them for honoring the most important of our institutions and resumed his seat amid applause.

Mr. Preston had not been identified for several years past with school matters and therefore was not in a position to speak with authority on the subject. He agreed with the inspector that the county council took more interests in school affairs than formerly. He thought this was largely due, perhaps, to the fact that the county has been called upon to enquire into the workings of these schools. The county council had ever been found willing to contribute liberally to the high schools of the county. If they would pardon him he would make a sugges tion to the county council in reference to the Collegiate Institute. Of late the Grand Jury when in session, had been induced to visit this institution and the oftener they went the more desirous they seemed of going. Their report made the Institute known to the people far and wide and people at a distance were induced to become interested in it. He would suggest that when in session the county council would visit the schools in a body and see that they were getting value for the money expended. A boy could receive in our schools in Ontario an education fitting him for every position in society. Referring to our advancement in education he said that we can receive in the Collegiate Institute in Napanee to-day as good an education as not his opponents—for he had none, thank God—but his predecessor, to show to what extent the school was robbing the people $1 per hundred acres—of course he didn't deny that the schools were robbing the public, but what he wanted to know was to what extent. Mr. Filson then went on to show that there were about forty pupils attending the Newburgh High School, and boarding at home, who would be deprived of the advantages of a good education if it was abolished.

Mr. Bowen E. Aylsworth said it was a great pleasure for him to be present to partake of the bountiful hospitality of our worthy warden. It had been said that he felt rather lonesome in the present County Council. He knew that he had the sympathy of the warden in his bereavement, but he also knew that he wouldn't have it otherwise even if he could. He had not been in office long enough to find fault, but by next January he would make it a pleasure to mend the machinery of the county council. He thought that it wanted oiling occasionally as there was some complaint about the way the machinery was working.

Mr. Lane, of Denbigh, was not a public speaker but he would be wanting in common pluck if he did not say something. The county council had made an excellent selection in their choice of Warden. He combined economy and sharpness with fairness and although he came from so far back he had no fear but that the Warden would give them all fair play. They would have to excuse a backwoodsman for referring to the schools of which Mr. Burrows had so fully and ably spoken. Any man who would oppose the grants to those schools was what he would term a "squealer." With the remark, "Long live our Warden," Mr. Lane took his seat.

Mr. Wilde said it was the first time he had the opportunity of attending a social gathering of this description. There would be no difference between county councillors as long as they had a social time. He would not occupy much of their time. He thought the grant of $400 to the poor schools was in the interest of progress and economy and it afforded him much pleasure to vote fo that grant. He was very much pleased with the Warden.

Mr. Chalmers said this was the third time he had the pleasure of attending one of these gatherings and the social time he had at the Warden's inaugural dinner was sufficient reward for the trouble in getting elected. He would always appreciate Mr. Carson's kindness to him especially on his first year when he was a stranger to all the ways of the council. He looked upon the Warden as one of the fathers of the county council and had watched his actions at the Board and was greatly benefited by the observations. Mr. Chalmers believed he was the youngest member of the county council and represented the oldest and smallest township in the county.

Mr I. F. Aylsworth said he was pleased to be present, but as he had not expected to make a speech he would just repeat a long one that he heard at a tea-meeting: "I didn't come here to make a speech and I aint a going to."

A trio by Messrs. Maybee, Henwood and Daly was much appreciated.

"The Learned Professions."—"How oft we see cold wisdom waiting on superfluous folly."—Responded to by G.C.T. Ward, M. D.

Dr. Ward said the vice-chairman had referred to two classes of men who made good after dinner speakers, the fools and the inspired. They would excuse him if, after the habit of his profession, he made a little diagnose of the case. He laid no claim to being inspired but he frequently perspired and he often noticed that the more copious the perspiration the dryer the speaking. He esteemed the Warden very much. He was the first gentleman he became acquainted with on his arrival in Napanee and their intercourse had always been of the pleasantest.

Mr. F. S. Rockwell favored the guests with an excellent song, which was well received.

"Our County Town."—"All I see in you is worth loving."—Responded to by Mayor Stevens, Thos. Jamieson, Deputy Reeve Symington and A. L. Morden, Q. C.

Mayor Stevens had been associated with the Warden in the town council for a number of years and found him a pleasant associate. They never had a dispute or any unkindness or unpleasantness. Mr. Stevens thought we had one of the nicest towns in the Province. The chief engineer's on the G. T. R. had told him that we had in Napanee one of the finest viaducts on the whole system. He referred to our different schools and was sorry that the council had decided, in their wisdom, to take no action in regard to the erection of a Poor House.

Mr. Jamieson had lived in Napanee for

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

ADOLPHUSTOWN.

A very interesting event took place in St. Alban's church at 12 o'clock to-day. The marriage of Mr. Mark Bogart Trumpour, only son of Jacob Trumpour esq. a resident of this township to Miss Ida May Taverner eld st daughter of Alfred Taverner esq., of South Fredericksburgh. The bride was most tastefully attired in cream silk her head was adorned with orange blossoms and a long veil. After the wedding the happy pair started for Napanee where they took the train for Toronto.

WILTON.

Saturday's and Sunday's storm completely blocked up the roads, so that no mail was received after Friday, until Tuesday. Several of the school teachers of the surrounding country were also stormbound at Wilton, and were unable to reach their respective schools before Tuesday.

Little Dell Martin, second daughter of Samuel Martin, of Florida, died on Friday last, after two week's severe suffering. The funeral was held Monday afternoon, at the house. Rev. Mr. Coombe, giving a short but appreciative sermon. Mr. and Mrs. Martin have the heart felt sympathy of the entire neighborhood in their bereavement.

The infant daughter of N. A. Asselstine died at the residence of Mrs. Smith, Violet, last Thursday.

L. L. Gallagher has rented his store to his brother Aaron Gallagher. The former will still reside in Wilton.

Mrs. Thomas Mills is convalescent.

Erwell Miller, Kingston, Business College, spent Saturday and Sunday with his parents.

PALACE ROAD.

As I was was working by the road side one day this week an old gentleman came along and said, Boss, How are you? I said all quite well, thank you. Well, said he, Palace road has improved since I lived around here. He said he was quite surprised to see in one of his neighbor's papers that my friend, "Jacob," did not succeed in taking his seat at the council board this year. No, I said, I was sorry to say "Jacob" got left; well said he, has Charlie Files succeded in raising straw berries as big as hen's eggs yet, I said, Mr. Files raised a nice variety of berries, well said he, Charlie has a nice place for them anyway, well said he, how does Robert Milligan make it go selling tea? I said, Robert has about given up the tea business and is now in the Insurance business, well well, Robert don't stay at one thing too long at a time. Well does John Milligan run foot races any more? I said, no only when he is scared and then he runs on a circular track generally around a tree, he ran a race a few days ago, in about 2.40, down by the frozen river. Well has George Shibley succeeded in making his hair grow yet? well, I said, George was encouraged when reading his bible the other day where it says the hairs in our heads are numbered, and he has sent for the back numbers. Ha ha ha, George will do it yet. How is my old friend Clinton getting along, has he succeeded in getting a government job yet? I said no, but Mr. Jenkins had hopes. Has our old friend the blacksmith shingled his shop yet? I said no. He says it don't need shingling when the sun shines and when it rains he can't shingle it. Well has Jim Long got married yet? I said no, that Mr. Long hadn't any time to spend in courting, as he has a good deal of travelling up his back lane in winter to get to his back barn. Well, I suppose Gerow is making cheese yet. I said yes. Mr. Gerow was a shining light in the cheese making line. Well does Stacey Vanalstine talk as much politics as ever? I said yes, "Stacey" was our authority on all Municipal matters. How is Willett getting along, does he sit on the fence and watch his grain grow as he used to do. I said Mr. Vanalstine was a model farmer, and likes to see things moving rapidly along. Where is my friend Jimmie Milligan? has he sold out and gone away? I said no, Mr. Milligan was still living here. Well, well, well, said he. I never heard of Jimmy staying in one place so long. Does Son Snider and Frank Vanalstine still live around here? I said yes, Son was a first-class cheese maker and Frank has got to be a model farmer. Well, well, I must be going as I have found out all the news of my old home. So I will say good-bye.

NAPOLEON'S HABITS.

PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE GREAT MAN OF DESTINY.

He Shaved Himself for Fear of an Assassin and Took Great Care of His Hands and Teeth, but Was Not Particular About His Food.

When Napoleon got up in the morning the first thing he did was to bathe, but his bath could not have been very refreshing, for it consisted of eau de cologne. This habit of rubbing which Napoleon had, as he said, brought from the east, and to which he partly attributed his health, seemed to him most important. They were not allowed to do it gently. "Harder!" said he to the valet de chambre, "Harder! As though you were rubbing a donkey."

THE EMPEROR DRESSES.

After the bathing, washing and rubbing the Emperor dressed himself. Over his flannel waistcoat he wore concealed a small bag of deadly poison, which he intended to take when captured, but of which he made no use. After the flannels came his shirt.

"Afterwards Constant put on his feet very light merino socks, over which he drew stockings of white silk, kept up by elastic garters; he handed to him a pair of drawers of very fine linen or twilled cotton and a pair of knee breeches of white kerseymere, fastened at the knee with a small gold buckle. At times, when, instead of shoes with gold buckles, Napoleon was going to put on soft riding boots, he wore very tight pantaloons of white kerseymere or of knitted cotton. The knee breeches or pantaloons were held up with elastic braces."

He wore his shoes much longer than his feet, and he kept them constantly changing.

"Having put on his shoes and a very thin cravat of muslin, and over it a stiff stock of black silk, very high and broad and with a flap in front. Napoleon put on a round waistcoat of white kerseymere—a waistcoat coming lower down than the waistcoats of to-day. This waistcoat was reckoned with the knee-breeches at 85 francs by the usual tailor, Chevalier, and at 64 francs by Lejeune, who in 1815 replaced Chevalier. The Emperor changed his waistcoat and knee-breeches every morning, only wearing them when clean, and having them washed only three or four times.

"Careful as he was of his person, he was very little so of his clothes. He

THE SLAUGHTER OF America's Record Did Not Approa Horror That of Europe.

By and by, however, when the revival in classic studies filled Europe with sceptics, the suspicion of the church was directed against a new danger, till the name of a scholar had almost become a synonym of heretic. From that stigma it was only a step to the charge of sorcery. Not philosophers and alchemists only, but prelates, princes and at least two Popes incurred the suspicion of "black art" by the unusual extent of their erudition.

In 1350 a witch was formerly tried in Augsburg, Germany, and convicted upon the testimony of nineteen witnesses, who claimed to have seen her perform all sorts of tricks in the shape of a black cat. She had been caught crouching over the cradle of sleeping children, who laughed in their dreams in answer to the blasphemous scurrility of her whispered remarks. She had also been seen hobnobbing with the devil and stirring a caldron of witch-broth, but in spite of the strongly supported evidence the judges hesitated for a week before they agreed on the fatal verdict.

Three similar cases were tried in Padua, Linz (Upper Austria) and Strasburg in the course of the next ten years, and upon the basis of those precedents the Christian world soon after appeared to go crazy en masse. Witch commissionors with there posse of bullies roamed from village to village, the jails were crowded with prisoners, who in many cases seem to have lost their wits as completely as their persecutors. Death by fire became the usual form of execution. The terrible name of the R. chamber ardente or fire court would applied to thousands of tribunals in W tern and Southern Europe.

The ghastly insanity reached its cu tion point about the end of the fifte century, and it seems a merciful disp tion of Providence that by that time the progress of American colonies had opened a gate of escape to the far west. Witchcraft trials occurred in Spanish America and here and there in the English settlements, but on the whole the settlers of the New World were too busy with terrestial problems to waste much time on the mysteries of supernaturalization. Some forty or fifty thousand Mexicans may have been burned on a charge of black art during the first three centuries of the Spanish dominion and perhaps 3,000 persons in all British North America, for those aggregates are the veriest trifle compared with that of mediæval Europe. Professor Hitzig of Berlin, after a careful comparison of all the available records, estimates the total number of victims from the and of the fourteenth to the beginning of the eighteenth century at 7,500,000. Gavinet in his "Memoir de la Magie" assumes a much higher aggregate, and Dr. Sprenger in his "Life of Mohammed" may come very near the true medium in computing the total for all Europe and America at 9,000,000.—San Francisco Chronicle.

hot water. He stayed in the bath for an hour, sometimes longer. It St, Helena he passed days and sometimes nights in the tub.

"On leaving the bath he put on a waistcoat of flannel, a shirt similar to that which he wore at night (for his shirts of semi-hollande at 60 francs and afterwards at 48 francs apiece were all of the same pattern); then he put on his chamber costume, composed in summer of a pair of drawers with feet and a long coat or dressing gown of white twilled dimity; in winter of stout twilled cotton drawers with feet and of a dressing gown of white duffle. On his head he kept the bandana which he slept in knotted over the forehead, the two corners of which hung down behind on his shoulders, In this costume he worked for a long time with his secretary, and began to dictate letters, or even, if it was a case of urgency, he received one of the Ministers in the back cabinet."

NAPOLEON SHAVES.

The Emperor used to be shaved by his valets, but he finally learned to shave himself for fear of foul play. It was very rare for a gentleman to shave himself in those days. He was obliged to employ a barber on his hair, so why not on his face? When the Emperor shaved Constant held the basin and the soap, while Roustam, the Marmeluke, held the mirror. The Emperor, in a flannel waistcoat, flooded one side of his face with lather, which he splashed all around him; then he wiped himself, took a razor with a handle of pearl inlaid with gold, which had been previously dipped in hot water, and then began to shave himself.

"As soon as the Emperor had shaved one side of his face every one turned round. Roustam with his mirror passed from right to left, or from left to right, following the light, and the operation continued. The Emperor before finishing asked every one if he was well shaved. Cheerful and fond of a joke, he commonly pulled the ears of his valets de chambre if he discovered that a hair had escaped him. His beard was thick, rather hard, and appears to have varied in color; but this is supposition rather than a matter of certainty. Never at any period of his life, except during his very last days in St. Helena, did he miss being shaved. A beard of a week's growth was a phenomenon to him. From the few hairs which we have seen preserved in collections, no decision can be formed as to their color.

"After he had shaved, the Emperor washed his hands with almond paste and rose or Windsor soap. He washed his face with small and very fine sponges, and frequently dipped his head into a silver basin, which from its size might have been taken for a small copper. Such was the washing stand of fifteen inches diameter which was taken from the Elysee to St. Helena in 1815.

"Having washed his face and hands, he picked his teeth very carefully with a boxwood toothpick, and then brushed them for some time with a brush dipped in opiate, went over them again with fine tooth powder and rinsed his mouth with a mixture of brandy and fresh water. Lastly he scraped his tongue with a scraper of silver, of silver gilt or of tortoise shell. It was to these minute precautions that he attributed that perfect preservation of all his teeth, which were beautiful, strong and regular. During the whole of his reign he never appears to have had recourse, except for scaling, to Dubois, his surgeon-dentist, borne on the list for 6,000 francs, and the recipient of a gold traveling case, the instruments in which were for the exclusive use of the Emperor."

PERFUMED AND RUBBED DOWN.

Napoleon was much more English than French in his devotion to the "tub." The desire he expressed for large quantities of water to wash in astonished his attendants. After the washing operations were completed the Emperor with very great calmness proceeded to trim his nails. He had beautiful hands and he knew it, so he took the best care of them.

Having attended to his nails, Napoleon took off his flannel jacket, had some eau de cologne poured on his head, and with a stiff brush himself brushed his chest and arms. The valet de chambre afterwards scrubbed his back and then applied friction to the whole of his body, pouring on it vials full of splashed the ink about by tossing his pen on the writing table. This did not make him change them during the day, any more than his silk stockings, although he had the habit of rubbing one leg with the heel of the shoe of the other foot when it itched. The renewing of the waistcoats and knee-breeches was a serious matter. Forty-eight were to be supplied yearly, and they ought to have lasted three years, but there was always a deficiency. In 1811, on going through the wardrobe, there were only seventy-four instead of one hundred and forty-four; the others must have been put aside."

THE TOILET COMPLETED.

When the emperor had completed his toilet and prepared to leave his apartments, he took his hat, which the first valet handed to him, in his left hand. This was his famous hat of black beaver lined with quilted silk, which when exposed to the rain got soaked and flopped down over his face and shoulders, but he was constant to it.

After his hat the emperor received his handkerchief on which some eau de Cologne had been sprinkled. then his eyeglass, his bonbonniere and a snuff-box. Of the latter he had a collection of the most expensive kind, but those he used were plain. This elaborate toilet was completed at 9 o'clock; then the official day began. The levee lasted till 9.30, when the dejeuner was served—if the emperor was ready for it, which he would not be if the business was of importance.

THE DEJEUNER.

Napoleon cared very little about eating, which was a source of great unhappiness to his cook, and he cared even less about drinking. He rarely ever drank anything but Chambertin, and that mixed with a good deal of water. He had no wine cellar, but bought what wine was necessary for his household by contract when he wanted it.

Napoleon always took his dejeuner alone, except during the very short time between his second marriage and the confinement of the Empress. Josephine never took dejeuner with him, and after the birth of the King of Rome the Emperor resumed his solitary habits, which suited him better. From the birth of his son, the gouvenante of the children of France was ordered to bring the child every day at time of dejeuner. He took him on his knees, made him taste his reddened water, and put to his lips a little of any gravy or sauce which came to hand. Mme. de Montesquieu remonstrated; the Emperor burst out laughing—it was for his son and with his son that he had his only noisy gaiety—and the infant king laughed with him. The Empress was often present, and was amused also at these little scenes."

NAPOLEON AT WORK.

What a boon stenography and typewriting would have been to Napoleon—or perhaps I should say to his secretary! He dictated with a rush that no man could keep up with in long hand, so that his secretaries were obliged to invent a shorthand of their own. Even then they could not always give his words, but had to satisfy themselves with getting the sense of his dictation.

He was an insatiable worker and kept three secretaries busy. He expected them to work as hard as he did, which, not being Napoleons, was out of the question.

The dinner was an important meal at the Tuileries. The schedule time for it was 6 o'clock, but Napoleon was very apt to forget all about it and it would sometimes be as late as 11 o'clock before he entered the salle a manger. This occurred oftener in Josephine's time. Marie Louise liked her dinner at 6, and if Napoleon did not come at that hour she sent for him. This Josephine never dared to do, but Marie Louise was an Archduchess and did not stand in the same awe of her imperial spouse. Napoleon worked during the dinner hour as well as before and after it. It was then that his librarian came to him to tell him of the new books and to read him translations from foreign newspapers. No distraction, no pleasure, no gratification of the senses prevailed over work. It was no unusual thing for him to get up after having slept for three hours and dictate to his secretary. Then he would go back to bed and sleep for six hours without waking.

The more we read of Napoleon Bona-carries a small cage attached to his machine, in which are several well-trained pigeons. When important observations have been taken and jotted down they are placed in envelopes and affixed to the birds, which are liberated. In every instance thus far the birds have flown promptly and in a straight line back to headquarters over distances of from ten to twenty kilometers. It is thought that this combination of bicycle and pigeon service can be very profitably used in military observations, and the Italian Army Office proposes to continue the experiments.—Chicago Tribune.

Jews, Not Hebrews.

The word Hebrew now has but one meaning, and that is a dead language. Jews, because we are adherents of the Jewish religion. Our religion is the only point of distinction between us and other citizens of this country.

There is an impression in the minds of many non-Jews, and even some Jews, that it is courtesy to call us Hebrews, thus implying that there is some stigma attached to the name of Jew. The Tidings is constantly seeking to remove this impression. We are Jews, not Hebrews or Isrealites.—Jewish Tidings.

A NEWSBOY'S CHRISTMAS.

He Remembered the Feast and Afterward Paid Back the Quarter.

One Christmas night an old-time newspaper writer stepped into a cheap restaurant in Park Row. He had enjoyed a hearty dinner, but as the air was raw and cold he wanted a cup of hot coffee. As he took his seat at one of the small tables a ragged little boy planted himself on the stool opposite him. If ever there was gnawing hunger depicted on a human face it was on that boy's, and there was a wolfish glare in his eyes as he fumbled a nickel and said : "A plate of beans."

The waiter also took the other's order. As the writer sipped his coffee he watched the boy ravenously devour the beans. Whispering to the waiter, he told him to bring a plate of corned beef, some bread and butter and a bowl of coffee for the boy. The little fellow stared for a moment, then sweetened his coffee, and, seizing a knife and fork, began his meal. In a few minutes the beef, beans, bread and coffee had disappeared, yet the boy's appetite was not satisfied.

"What kind of pie do you like?" asked the write.

"Most enny kind; they's all good," replied the boy.

"Bring him some mince and pumpkin pie," said the writer to the waiter.

The boy gazed at the two plates of pie in wonderment then looked up shyly and pushed his nickel toward the writer.

"What's that for?" asked the man.

"To pay for de spread ; it's all I've got."

Taking a quarter from his pocket, the writer laid it on the boy's coin and pushed them across the table.

"Is them for me?" said the boy, with his mouth full of pie. "Am I to have all dat?"

"Yes; this is Christmas night, you know."

"Yis; I remember; but I have no money fer me lodging, so I didn't get any of the dinner down at the newsboys' lodging house. Tank you, mister. Youse is good ter me."

Leaving the boy to finish his supper, the man passed out into the busy street, feeling happy over the incident. Months passed and he had almost forgotten it, when one day a boy stopped him near

A Woman's Wrong.

Bishop Starkey, of the diocese of northern New Jersey of the Protestant Episcopal Church, has caused considerable discussion by denying to female choristers the right to wear vestments or to enter the chancel. His decision concerns, in particular, Christ church, Jersey City. The rector's daughter, Miss Kate Battin had organized a mixed and surplice choir, consisting of ten male and ten female voices, and had supplied snow-white surplices and cups for the female choristers. Bishop Starkey interposed as soon as he learned of the project. He had no objection to the blending of male and female voices, but the ladies could not be permitted in church with surplices, and could not enter the chancel. In behalf of the ladies, it is stated that similar choirs have been permitted in other Protestant Episcopal churches without question. Here is indeed a horrible example of man's cold-bloodedness and tyranny, which I make a present of to my fair friends among the advocates of "woman's rights."

"I don't see why; those sleeves are enough to make a bride envious."

"Yes; but—do you know if Harry Sweeting is here to-night?"

"Yes. Why do you ask?"

"Why, you see. I accepted Curtis today."

"What has that to do——"

"O, dear! evevything. I am afraid that he will feel just awfully, and I'm so tender-hearted that——"

"Did you see this morning's paper?"

"Me. Were a lot of bargains advertised? You see, I had a note from Curtis by the first mail. He said he would call in the afternoon and I was so busy getting ready that I never thought of the paper. But about Harry; he has been coming down our street twice a day for the last six months. At first he would just pass on the other side of the street, pretending not even to glance at our house."

"O, he was——"

"Timid? Yes, that was it. I felt really touched by such silent devotion, and after that I would often tap on the window and call him over, but he would be so nervous and ill at ease all the time. Why, he would not even look at wedding to be?"

"Is Fanny engaged?"

"Yes, the morning paper announced it. She's taken Harry Sweeting at last, and I'm glad of it—I'm tired of seeing him pass every day on his way to her house. Aren't you going down now? I should think you would want to show that lovely gown."

Relative to Kansas Air.

A man from the tamarack swamps went to Kansas thinking to improve his condition, but after three years of it he returned to his native heath.

"How did you like it out there?" asked an acquaintance.

"Not very much."

"It's a good country, ain't it?"

"I've seen better."

"The air is better there than it is here, ain't it?"

"Sometimes it is, but not always."

"I don't see why it ain't as good one time as another."

"Well, it ain't."

"Why?"

"Cyclones."

"I thought they purified it."

"That's what I thought till I tried it, but when I had to breathe furniture and weatherboardin' and bedclo's and shingles and live stock and household goods and farms and fence rails and that sort of thing about three times a week I sort of changed my mind and come away. Kansas may have some advantages, but air ain't one of them as a steady thing."

Manchester's Ridiculous Chief of Police.

The chief of police has recently issued an order prohibiting any police officer to furnish information to reporters on pain of suspension. The situation is not without its humors.

A book agent had just arrived in Manchester. As he walked up from the station he inquired of an Elm street officer. "Can you tell me the way to Hanover station?"

"The officer regarded him suspiciously. "Are you a newspaper man?" he asked.

The stranger hesitated, "I have been," he stammered.

"Then I tell you nothing," replied the bluecoat edging away. "The chief has given us orders not to furnish any information to newspaper men."

One of the Manchester reporters early one morning discovered a blaze in a pile of rubbish in a back street. "Where's the nearest firebox?" he asked, rushing up to an officer.

"Let's see, you're a newspaper man, aren't you?" queried the patrolman.

"Yes; where's the box?"

"Can't tell," was the reply, "Chief's orders."—Manchester Union.

"Why," asked the philosopher, "why is it that a man—the noblest created object—why is it that a man should have such doubts of his ability to win a woman's affection, when he considers the success in that line of a pop-eyed, pudding-shaped, pretzel-tailed pug-dog?"

But the assembled listeners answered him not.

How Swiss Children Go to Sleep.

The Swiss people are very artistic in their tastes and even the poorest Swiss is neat and tasteful in his home life. Many of the ways of the Swiss are as pretty as their fanciful ideas of building houses. A Swiss mother believes that her child will have bad dreams unless it is crooned to sleep. And so, bending low over the drowsy little one's couch, she sings soothing songs of green pastures and still waters until the little child has breathed itself peacefully into the land of Nod.—New York Ledger.

The Deer of Scotland.

Of the four-footed game the largest are the deer. The roebuck is the only member of the family in a truly wild condition. His small size, nimbleness and ungregarious habits enable him to wander from one place to another with a measure of impunity. In wooded valleys and within reach of the hills he seems to be well able to look after himself. He abounds in the northern counties—in Perthshire, the highland districts of Aberdeenshire and Forfarshire, and is thinly scattered over the central valley.

The red deer or stag has by no means the same claim to be regarded as a wild animal as in the days when the Commons King made his memorable excursion through the Trossachs. He is now cooped up in savage fastnesses, with mountain fences 3,000 feet high, behind which he only wanders in an exceptionally hard winter. The "forests" with which I am acquainted would neither maintain a crofter nor even reimburse a sheep farmer, and are simply incapable of being put to any other use.

In the middle of the day the deer are seldom to be seen, except by a practical eye, as they are then at rest and lying quietly among the rough heath, or it may be in the shadow of some birch corpse. In the early morning or on the approach of evening they feed downward toward the grassy sides of the rivers and burns. They detect the intruding botanist or geologist long before they see him, and by their actions apprise the keeper that a trespasser is at hand. The fallow deer is still further from the true feral condition and can only be regarded as an ornamental domestic animal kept to give picturesqueness to the park around the mansion. His grass is provided and his water is sure.—Gentleman's Magazine.

Minard's Liniment cures Garget in Cows

A TERRIBLE SECRET.

CHAPTER VIII.

IN THE DARKNESS.

Half an hour's rapid gallop had brought Edwards, the valet, to Powyss Palace. The stately mansion, park, lawn, and terraces, lay bathed in the silvery shower of moonlight. From the upper windows, where the sick man lay, lights streamed; all the rest of the house was in deep shadow.

In one of those dimly lighted rooms Sir Victor Catheron lay upon a lounge fast asleep. He had remained for about two hours by the sick man's bedside; then, persuaded by his aunt, had gone to lie down in an inner department.

"You look pale and ill yourself," she said, tenderly; "lie down and rest for a little. If I need you, I will call you at once."

He had obeyed, and had dropped off into a heavy sleep. A dull oppression of heart and soul beset him; he had no mind to slumber—it had come upon him unawares. He was awakened suddenly by some one calling his name.

"Victor! Victor!" the voice called, "awake!"

He sat up with a bewildered face. Was that his aunt's voice, so hoarse, so strange? Was this his aunt with that white, horror-struck face?

"Victor!" she cried, the words a very wail. "Oh, my boy! my boy! how shall I ever tell you? Oh, why did I send for you this dreadful night? Ethel"—her voice choked.

He rose to his feet, staring at her blankly.

"Ethel!" he repeated. "Ethel—"

She covered her face with her hands and burst into a hysterical outbreak of tears. Edwards, standing behind her in the doorway, made a step forward.

"Tell him, Edwards," said Lady Helena. "I cannot. It seems too horrible to tell or to believe. Oh, my poor Victor! my poor, poor boy!"

Edwards came forward reluctantly, with a very pale, scared face.

It's dreadful news, Sir Victor—I don't know how to tell you, but my lady, I'm afraid she—she's dead."

"Dead!"

He repeated the word dully, staring almost stupidly at the speaker.

"Dead, Sir Victor!" the man repeated, solemnly. "I'm sore afraid, murdered!"

There was a sudden, headlong rush from the room; no other reply. Like a flash Sir Victor passed them both. They heard him clear the stairs, rush along the lower hall, and out of the house. The next instant the valet and Lady Helena were in pursuit.

He was mounted on Edwards' horse and dashing furiously away, before they reached the court-yard. They called to him—he neither heard nor heeded. He dashed his spurred heel into the horse's side and flew out of sight like the wind.

"Follow him!" Lady Helena cried, breathlessly, to the groom. "Overtake him, for the love of Heaven! Oh, who can have done this awful deed? Edwards you are sure there is no mistake? It seems too unnatural, too impossible to believe."

"There is no mistake, my lady," the man answered, sadly. "I saw her myself, the blood flowing where they had stabbed her, cold and dead."

Lady Helena wrung her hands and turned away.

"Ride for your life after your master!" she said. "I will follow you as soon as I can."

She went back to her husband's side. He was no worse—he seemed if anything, better. She might leave him in the housekeeper's charge until morning.

She ordered the carriage and rapidly changed her dress. It was about one in the morning when she reached Catheron Royals. The tall turrets were silvered in the moonlight, the windows sparkled in the crystal light. The sweet beauty and peace of the September night lay like a benediction over the earth. And, amid all the silence and sweetness, a foul, a most horrible murder had been done.

She encountered Mrs. Marsh, the housekeeper, in the hall, her face pale, her eyes red with weeping. Some ding hope that up to this time had upheld her, that, after all, there might be a mistake, died out then.

"Oh, Marsh," she said piteously, "is it true?"

Mrs. Marsh's answer was a fresh burst of tears. Like all the rest of the household, the gentle ways, the sweet face, and soft voice of Sir Victor's wife had won her heart from the first.

"It is too true, my lady—the Lord have mercy upon us all. It seems too horrible there, four hours ago, in her own house, surrounded by her own servants, some monster in human form stabbed her through the heart—through the heart, my lady—Dr. Dane says one blow did it, and that death must have been instantaneous. So young, so sweet, and so lovely. Oh, how could they do it—how could any one do it?"

Mrs. Marsh's sobs grew hysterical, Lady Helena's own tears were flowing.

"I feel as though I were guilty in some way myself," the housekeeper went on. "If we had only woke her up, or fastened the window, or anything! I know the monster whoever he was, got in through the window. And, oh, my lady!"—Mrs. Marsh wiped her eyes suddenly, and lowered her voice to an excited whisper—"I wish you would speak to Jane Pool, the nurse. She doesn't dare say anything out openly, but the looks she gives, and the hints she drops, are almost worse than the murder itself. You can see as clear as day that she suspects—Miss Inez."

"Marsh! Great Heaven!" Lady Helena cried, recoiling in horror. "Miss Inez!"

"Oh, my lady, I don't say it—I don't think it—Heaven forbid!—it's only that wicked, spiteful nurse, Pool. She hates Miss Inez—she has hated her from the first—and she loved my lady. Ah! who could help being fond of her—poor, lovely young lady!—with a sweet smile and pleasant word for every one in the house? And you know Miss Inez's high, haughty way. Jane Pool hates her, and will do her mischief if she can. A word from you might check her. No one knows the harm a babbling tongue may do."

Lady Helena drew herself up proudly.

"I shall not say one word to her, Marsh. Jane Pool can do my niece no harm. The bare repetition of it is an insult. Miss Catheron—that I should have to say such a thing!—is above suspicion."

"My lady, I believe it; still, if you would only speak to her. You don't know all. She saw Miss Inez coming out of the nursery a quarter of an hour before we found Lady Catheron dead. She wished to enter, and Miss Inez ordered her away. She has been talking to the police, and I saw that Inspector Darwin watching Miss Inez in a way that made my blood run cold."

But Lady Helena waived the topic away haughtily.

"Be silent, Marsh! I will not hear another word of this—it is too horrible! Where is Miss Inez?"

"In her own room, my lady. And—I beg your pardon for alluding to it again—but I think she suspects. She seemed dazed-like, stupefied at first; she is more like herself now. Will you not go in and see her, poor soul, before you go to Miss Inez? Oh, my lady, my lady! it breaks my heart when I look at her—when I look at Sir Victor."

For a moment Lady Helena shrank.

"Sir Victor is in there—with her?" she faltered.

"Yes, my lady—like a man all struck stupid. It frightens me to see him. If he would only speak, or cry, or fly out against the murderer—but he just sits there as if turning to stone."

His aunt covered her face for an instant with both hands, heart-sick with all these horrors; then she looked up, and moved forward.

"Where is she?" she asked—"in which room?"

"In the white drawing-room, my lady; the doctors brought her there. Sir Victor is with her, alone."

Lady Helen slowly advanced. At the door she paused a moment to nerve herself for what she must see; then she turned the handle and went in.

It was one of the stateliest rooms in the house—all white and gold, and dimly lit now by wax tapers. Lying on one of the white velvet sofas she saw a rigid figure, over which a white covering was drawn; but the golden hair and the fair, marble face gleaming in the waxlights as beautiful as ever in life.

He sat beside his dead—almost as motionless, almost as cold, almost as white. He had loved her with a love that was akin to idolatrous—he had grudged that the eye of man should rest on his treasure—and now he sat beside her—dead.

If he heard the door open, he neither moved nor stirred. He never once looked up as his aunt came forward; his eyes were riveted upon that ineffably calm face with a vacant, sightless sort of stare that chilled her blood.

"Victor!" she cried out, in a frightened voice; "Victor speak to me. For pity's sake don't look like that?"

The dull, blinded eyes looked up at her, full of infinite, unutterable despair.

"She is dead," he said, in a slow, dragging sort of voice—"dead! And last night murdered—to—be—murdered.

The slow words fell heavily from his lips—his eyes went back to her face, his dulled mind seemed lapsing into its stupefied trance of quiet. More and more alarmed, his aunt gazed at him. Had the death of his wife turned his brain?

"Victor!" she exclaimed, almost angrily, "you must rouse yourself. You must not stay here. Be a man! Wake up. Your wife has been murdered. Go and find her murderer."

"Her murderer," he replied, in the same slow tone of unnatural quiet; "her murderer. It seems strange, Aunt Helena, doesn't it, that any one could murder her? 'I must find her murderer.' Oh," he cried suddenly, in a voice of anguish; "what does it matter about her murderer! It won't bring her back to life. She is dead! to you—dead!"

He flung himself off his chair, on his knees by the couch. He drew down the white satin counterpane, and pointed to one dark, small stab on the left side.

"Look!" he said, in a shrill, wailing voice, "through the heart—through the heart! She did not suffer—the doctors say that. Through the heart as she slept. Oh, my love, my darling, my wife!"

He kissed the wound—he kissed the hands, the face, the hair. Then with a long, low moan of utter disolation, he drew back the covering and buried his face in it.

"Leave me alone," he said despairingly; "I will not go—I will never go from her again. She was mine in life—mine only. Juan Catheron lied, she is mine in death. My wife—my Ethel!"

He started up as suddenly as he had flung himself down, his ghastly face flaming dark red.

"Leave me alone, I tell you! Why do you all come here? I will not go! Leave me, I command you—I am master here!"

She shrank from him in absolute physical terror. Never over-strong at any time, her worst fears were indeed true, the shock of his wife's tragic death was turning Sir Victor's brain. There was nothing to be done—nothing to be said—he must be obeyed—must be soothed.

"Dear Victor," she said, "I will go. Don't be hard with poor Aunt Helena. There is no one in all this world as sorry for you as I am. Only tell me this before I leave you—shall we not send for her father and mother?"

"No," he answered, in the same fierce tone; "they can't bring her back to life—no one can now. I don't want them. I want nobody. Ethel is mine I tell you—mine alone!"

He motioned her imperiously to leave him—a light in his eye—a flush on his face there was no mistaking. She went at once. How was it all to end, she wondered, more and more sick at heart—this mysterious murder, this suspicion against Inez, this dreadful overthrow of her nephew's mind?

"May Heaven help us!" she cried. "What have we done that this awful trouble should come upon us!"

"Aunt Helena."

She looked around with a little cry, all her nerves trembling and unstrung. Inez stood before her—Inez with dark, resolute eyes, and stony face.

"I have been waiting for you—they told me you were there." She pointed with a shudder to the door. "What are we to do?"

"Don't ask me," Lady Helena answered, helplessly. "I don't know. I feel stunned and stupid with all these horrors."

"The police are here," Miss Catheron went on, "and the coroner has been apprised. I suppose they will hold an inquest to-morrow."

Her aunt looked at her in surprise. The calm, cold tone of her voice grated on her sick heart.

"Have you seen him?" she asked almost in a whisper. "Inez—I fear—I fear it is turning his brain."

Miss Catheron's short, scornful upper lip, curled with the old look of contempt.

"The Catheron brain was never noted for its strength. I shall not be surprised at all. Poor wretch!" She turned away and looked out into the darkness. "It does seem hard on him."

"Who can have done it?"

The question on every lip rose to Lady Helena's, but somehow she could not utter it. Did Inez know of the dark, sinster suspicion against herself? Could he know and be calm like this?"

"I forgot to ask for Uncle Godfrey," Inez's quiet voice said again. "Of course he is better, or even at such a time as this you would not be here!"

"He is better Inez," she broke out desperately. "Who can have done this? She had not an enemy in the world. Is—is there any one suspected?"

There is," Inez answered, turning from the window, and facing her aunt. "The servants suspect me."

"Inez!"

"Their case isn't a bad one as they make it out," pursued Miss Gatheron, coolly. "There was ill blood between us. It is of no use denying it. I hated her with my whole heart. I was the last person seen coming out of the room, fifteen minutes before they found her dead. Jane Pool says I refused to let her go in—perhaps I did. It is quite likely. About an hour before, we had a violent quarrel. The thought is Mrs. Pool overheard that also. You see her case is rather a strong one."

"But—Inez—!"

"I chanced to overhear all this," still went on Miss Catheron, quietly, but with set lips and gleaming eyes. "Jane Pool was holding forth to the inspector of police. I walked up to them, and they both slunk way like beaten curs. Orders have been issued, that no one is to leave the house. To-morrow these facts are to be placed before the coroner's jury. If they find me guilty—don't cry, Aunt Helena—I shall be sorry for you—sorry I have disgraced a good old name. For the rest, it doesn't much matter what becomes of such a woman as I am."

She turned again to the window looked out into the darkness. There was a desperate bitterness in her tone that Lady Helena could not understand.

"Good Heaven!" she burst forth, "one would think you were all in a conspiracy to drive me mad. It doesn't matter, what be of comes you doesn't it! I tell you if this last worst misery falls upon us, it will kill me on the spot; just that."

The girl sighed drearily.

"Kill you, Aunt Helena," she repeated, mournfully. "No—we don't any of us die so easily. Don't be afraid—I am not likely to talk in this way before any one but you. I am only telling you the truth. They will have the inquest, and all that Jane Pool can say against me will be said. Do yo think Victor will be able to appear?"

"I don't think Victor is in a condition to appear at an inquest or anywhere else. Ah, poor boy! he loved her so dearly, it is dea Death to shake the mind of a stronger passed. said her aunt, suddenly coming a from er, "a rumor has reached me—is it the ... that Juan is back—that he has been he...?"

"It is quite true," her niece answered, without turning round; he has been here. He was here on the night Lady Catheron first came."

"There is another rumor afloat, that there was a violent quarrel on that occasion that he claimed to be an old lover of Ethel's, poor child, and that Victor turned him out. Since then it is said he has been seen more than once prowling about the grounds. For everybody's sake I could tell him nothing more. "If you wants to find out about Miss Ines' brother," said Jimmy, "you go to old Hooper. He knows. All I know is, that they say he was an uncommon bad lot; but old Hooper, he's knowed him ever since he was a young 'un and lived here. If old Hooper says he wasn't here the night Sir Victor brought my lady home, don't you believe him—he was, and he's been seen off and on the grounds since. The women folks in the servants' hall, they say, as how he must have been an old sweetheart of my lady's. You go to old Hooper and worrit it out of him."

Mr. Superintendent Ferrick went. How artfully he began his work, how delicately and skillfully he "pumped" old Hooper dry, no words can tell. Mr. Juan Catheron was an "uncommon bad lot," he had come to the house and forced an entrance into the dining-room the night of Lady Catheron's arrival—there had been a quarrel, and he had been compelled to leave. Bit by bit this was drawn from Mr. Hooper. Since then, Jackson, the head groom, and Edwards, the valet, had seen him hovering about the grounds watching the house.

Mr. Ferrick ponders these things in his heart, and is still. This vagabond, Juan Catheron, follows my lady to Catheron Royals, is expelled, haunts the grounds, and a man answering to his description is discovered quarrelling with my lady, demanding money, etc., two or three hours before the murder. The window of the room, in which she takes that fatal sleep, opens on the lawn; any one may enter who sees fit. No one is about. The Oriental dagger lies convenient to his hand on the table. "Here, now," says Mr. Ferrick to Mr. Ferrick, with a reflective frown, "which is guilty—the brother or sister?"

He goes and gives an order to one of his men, and the man starts in search of Mr. Juan Catheron. Mr. Catheron must be found, though they summon the detectives of Scotland Yard to aid them in their search.

The dull hours wear on—the new day, sunny and bright, is with them. The white drawing-room is darkened—the master of Catheron Royals sits there alone with his dead. And presently the coroner comes, and talks with the superintendent, and they enter softly and look at the murdered lady. The coroner departs again—a jury is summoned, and the inquest is fixed to begin at noon next day in the Mitre tavern at Cheslholm.

Lady Helena returns and goes at once to her nephew. Inez, in spite of her injunctions, has never been near him once. He sits there still, as she left him many hours ago; he has never stirred or spoken since. Left to himself he is almost apathetic in his quiet—he rouses into fury, when they strive to take him away. As the dusk falls, Lady Helena, passing the door, hears him softly talking to the dead, and once—oh, pitiful Heaven! she hears a low, blood-chilling laugh. She opens the door and goes in. He is kneeling beside the sofa, holding the stark figure in his arms, urging her to get up and dress.

"It is a lovely night, Ethel, he says; "the moon is shining, and you know you like to walk out on moonlight nights. Do you remember, love, those nights at Margate, when we walked together first on the sands? Ah! you never lay like this, cold and still, then. Do get up, Ethel!" petulantly this; "I am tired of sitting here and waiting for you to awake. You have slept long enough. Get up!"

He tries to lift her. Horror struck, Lady Helena catches him in time to prevent it.

"Victor, Victor! she cries, "for the love of Heaven put her down. Come away. Don't you know she is dead?"

He lifts his dim eyes to her face, blind with the misery of a dumb animal.

"Dead!" he whispers.

Then with a low, moaning gasp, he falls back in her arms, fainting wholly away.

Her cries bring aid—they lift him and carry him up to his room, undress and place him in bed. The family physician is summoned—feels his pulse, hears what Lady Helena has to say, and looks very grave. The shock has been too much for a not overstrong body or mind. Sir Victor is in imminent danger of brain fever.

The night shuts down. A messenger comes to Lady Helena saying the squire is much better, and she makes up her mind to remain all night. Inez comes, pale and calm, and also takes her place by the stricken man's bedside, a great sadness and pity for the first time on her face. The White Room is locked—Lady Helena keeps the key—one pale light burns dimly in its glittering vastness. And as the night closes in blackness over the doomed house, one of the policemen comes in haste to Superintendent Ferrick, triumph in his face. He has found the dagger.

Mr. Ferrick opens his eyes rather—it is my bitterest shame to call brother. Was for you she would be alive and well. Do you think I do not know it? Go—living or dead, I never want to look upon your face again!"

Jane Pool hears these terrible words and stands paralyzed. Can it be that Miss Ines is not the murderess after all? The man retorts again—she does not hear how—then plunges into the woodland and disappears. An instant the girl stands motionless looking after him, then she turns and walks rapidly into the house.

CHAPTER IX.

FROM THE "CHESHOLM COURIER."

The Monday morning edition of the Cheslolm Courier, September 19th, 18—, contained the following, eagerly devoured by every man and woman in the county, able to read at all:

THE TRAGEDY AT CATHERON ROYALS.

"In all the annals of mysterious crime (began the editor with intense evident relish), nothing more mysterious, or more awful has ever been known, than the recent tragedy at Catheron Royals. In the annals of our town, of our county, of our country we may almost say, it stands unparalleled in its atrocity. A young and lovely lady, wedded little better than a year, holding the very highest position in society, in the sacred privacy of her own household, surrounded by faithful servants, is struck down by the dagger of the assassin. Her youth, her beauty, the sancity of slumber, all were powerless to shield her. Full of life, and hope, and happiness, she is foully and hideously murdered—her babe left motherless, her young husband bereaved and desolate. If anything were needed to make the dreadfully tragedy yet more dreadful, it is, that Sir Victor Catheron lies, as we write, hovering between life and death. The blow, which struck her down, has stricken him too—has laid him upon what may be his death-bed. At present he lies mercifully unconscious of his terrible loss tossing in the delirium of violent brain fever.

"Who, we ask, is safe after this? A lady of the very highest rank, in her own home, surrounded by her servants, in open day, is stabbed to the heart. Who, we ask again, is safe after this? Who was the assassin—what was the motive? Does that assassin yet lurk in our midst? Let it be the work of the coroner and his jury to discover the terrible secret, to bring the wretch to justice. And it is the duty of every man and woman in Cheltenham to aid, if they can, that discovery."

* * * * * *

FROM TUESDAY'S EDITION.

The inquest began at one o'clock yesterday in the parlor of the Mitre Inn, Lady Helena Powyss, of Powyss Place, and Miss Inez Catheron being present. The first witness called was Ellen Butters.

Ellen Butters, sworn.—"I was Lady Catheron's maid; I was engaged in London and came down with her here; on the afternoon of Friday, 16th, I last saw my lady alive, about half-past six in the afternoon; she had dressed for dinner; the family dinner hour is seven; saw nothing unusual about her; well, yes, she seemed a little out of spirits, but was gentle and patient as usual; when I had finished dressing her she threw her shawl about her, and took a book, and said she would go out a few minutes and take the air; she did go out, and I went down to the servant's hall; sometime after seven Jane Pool, the nurse, came down in a great flurry and said—"

The Coroner.—"Young woman we don't want to hear what Jane Pool said and did. We want to know what you saw yourself."

Ellen Butters (sulkily). — "Very well, that's what I'm trying to tell you. If Jane Pool hadn't said Sir Victor had gone off to Powyss Place, and that she didn't think it would be proper to disturb my lady just then, I would have gone up to my lady for orders. Jane had her supper and went up to the nursery for baby. She came back again after awhile—it was just past eight—in a temper, saying she had left my lady asleep when she took away baby, and returned to awake her. She had met Miss Inez who ordered her away about her business, saying my lady was still asleep. Jane Pool said—"

The Coroner. —"Young woman, we don't want to hear what Jane Pool said. Jane Pool will tell her own story presently; we won't trouble you to tell both. At what hour did you go up to the nursery yourself?"

Ellen Butters (more sulkily).—"I disremember; it was after eight. I could tell all about it better, if you wouldn't keep interrupting and putting me out. It was about a quarter or twenty minutes past eight, I think—"

The Coroner (dogmatically).—"What you think won't do. Be more precise if you please, and keep your temper. What on's family for twenty years. On the night of Friday last, as I sat in the servants' hall after supper, the young woman, Ellen Butters, my lady's London maid, came screeching downstairs like a creature gone mad, that my lady was murdered, and frightened us all out of our senses. As she was always a flighty person, I didn't believe her. I ordered her to be quiet, and tell us what she meant. Instead of doing it she gave a sort of gasp and fell fainting down in a heap. I made them lay her down on the floor, and then follow me up to the nursery. We went in a body—I at the head. There was no light but the moonlight in the room. My lady lay back in the arm-chair, her eyes closed, bleeding and quite dead. I ran up to Miss Inez's room and called her. My master was not at home, or I would have called him instead. I think she must have been dead some minutes. She was growing cold when I found her."

"William Hooper," continued the Cheslholm Courier, communicatively, "was cross-examined as to the precise time of finding the body. He said it was close upon half-past eight, the half-hour struck as he went up to Miss Inez's room."

James Dicksey was next called. James Dicksey, a shambling lad of eighteen, took his place, his eyes rolling in bject terror, and under the evident impression that he was being tried for his life. Every answer was wrung from this frightened youth, as with red-hot pinchers, and it was with the utmost difficulty anything consistent could be extorted at all.

"About half-past six on Friday evening, Mr. Dicksey was rambling about the grounds in the direction of the laurel walk. In the open ground it was still quiet light, in the laurel walk it was growing dusk. As he drew near, he heard voices—angry voices—the voices of a man and a woman. Peeped in and saw my lady. Yes, it was my lady—yes, he was sure. Was it likely now he wouldn't know my lady? The man was very tall, had a fusrin-looking hat pulled over his eyes, and stood with his back to him. He didn't see his face. They were quarrelling. Heard the man call her Ethel and ask for money. She wouldn't give it. Then he asked for jewels. She refused again, and ordered him to go. She was very angry—she stamped her foot once and said: 'If you don't go instantly I'll call my husband. Between you and your sister you will drive me mad.' When she said that, he guessed at once who the man was. It was Miss Inez's brother, Mr. Juan Catheron."

Mr. Dicksey was here sharply reprimanded, informed that his suspicions and hearsays were not wanted, and requested to come back to the point. He came back.

"My lady wouldn't give him anything, then he got mad and said: 'Give me the jewels, or by all the gods I'll blow the story of your marriage to me all over England!'"

The breathless silence of coroner, jury, and spectators at this juncture was something not to be described. In that profound silence, James Dicksey went rambling on to say, that he could swear before the Queen herself to those words, that he had been thinking them over ever since he had heard them, and that he couldn't make top or tail of them.

The Coroner (interrupting).—"What further did you overhear?"

James Dicksey.—"I heard what my lady said. She was in an awful passion, and spoke loud. She said, 'You will not, you dare not, you're a coward; Sir Victor has you in his power, and if you say one word you'll be silenced in Chesholm jail.' Then she stamped her foot again, and said, 'Leave me, Juan Catheron; I am not afraid of you.' He had heard no more; he was afraid of being caught, and had stolen quietly away. At ten o'clock that night was told of the murder, and was took all of a tremble. Had told Superintendent Ferrick something of this next day, but this was all—yes, so help him, all he had heard.

nope it was not true.

Inez faced round suddenly—almost fiercely.

"And what if I say it is true, in every respect? He did come—there was a quarrel and Victor ordered him out. Since then he has been here—prowling, as you call it—trying to see me, trying to force me to give him money. I was flinty as usual, and would give him none. Where is the crime in all that?"

"Has he gone?" was Lady Helena's response.

"I believe so—I hope so. He had nothing to stay for. Of course he has gone."

"I am glad of that, at least. And now, Inez, near as I can do nothing more at present, I weigh all return home. Watch Victor, Miss Inez needs it, believe me. I will return to the earliest possible moment to-morrow Monday."

From the chill gray of the fast-coming dawn Lady Helena, very heavy-hearted, Rode to Powyss Place and her sick husband's bedside.

Meantime matters were really beginning to look dark for Miss Catheron. The superintendent of the district, Mr. Ferrick, was filling his note-book with very ominous information. She had loved Sir Victor—she had hated Sir Victor's wife—they had led a cat-and-dog life from the first—an hour before the murder they had had a violent quarrel—Lady Catheron had threatened to make her husband turn her out of the house on the morrow. At eight o'clock, Jane Pool had left the nursery with the baby, my lady peacefully asleep in her chair—the Eastern poniard on the table. At half-past eight, returning to arouse my lady, she had encountered Miss Inez coming out of the nursery, and Miss Inez had ordered her sharply away, telling her my lady was still asleep. A quarter of nine, Ellen, the maid, going to the room, found my lady stone dead, stabbed through the heart. Miss Inez, when summoned by Hooper, is ghastly pale at first, and hardly seems to know what she is doing or saying. A very pretty case of tragedy in high life, Superintendent Ferrick thinks, pursing up his lips with professional zest, and not the first murder jealousy has made fine ladies commit, either. Now if that Turkish dagger would only turn up.

Two policemen are sent quietly in search of it through the grounds. It isn't likely they'll find it, still it will do no harm to try. He finds out which are Miss Catheron's rooms, and keeps his official eye upon them. He goes through the house with the velvet tread of a cat. In the course of his wanderings everywhere, he brings up presently in the stables, and finds them untenented, save by one lad, who sits solitary among the straw. He is rather a dull looking youth, with a florid, vacant face at most times, but looking dazed and anxious just now. "Something on his mind," thinks the superintendent, and sits socially down on a box beside him at once.

"Now, my man," Mr. Ferrick says, pleasantly, "and what is it that's troubling you? Out with it—every little's a help in a case like this."

The lad—his name is Jemmy—does not need pressing—his secret has been weighing uneasily upon him for the last hour or more, ever since he heard of the murder, in fact, and he pours his revelation into the superintendent's eager ear. His revelation is this:

Last evening, just about dusk, strolling by chance in the direction of the Laurel walk, he heard voices raised and angry in the walk—the voices of a man and a woman. He had peeped through the branches and seen my lady and a very tall man. No, it wasn't Sir Victor—it was a much bigger man, with long black curling hair. Didn't see his face. It was dark in there among the trees. Wasn't sure, but it struck him it might be the tall, black-avised man, who came first the night Sir Victor brought home my lady, and who had been seen skulking about the park once or twice since. Had heard a whisper, that the man was Miss Inez's brother—didn't know himself. All he did know was, that my lady and a man were quarrelling on the evening of the murder in the Laurel walk. What were they quarrelling about? Well, he couldn't catch their talk very well—it was about money, he thought. The man wanted money and jewels, and my lady wouldn't give 'em. He threatened to do something or tell something; then she threatened to have him put in Chesholm jail if he did. He, Jimmy, though full of curiosity, was afraid the man would spring out and catch him, and so at that juncture he came away. There! that was all, if it did the gentleman any good, he was welcome to it.

It did the gentleman a word of good—it complicated matters beautifully. Five minutes ago the case looked dark as night for Miss Catheron—here was a rift in her sky. Who was this man—was it Miss more than he expected.

"A bungler," he mutters, "whoever did it. Jones, where did you find this?"

Jones explains.

Near the entrance gates there is a wilderness of fern, or bracken, as high as your waist. Hidden in the midst of this unlikely place Jones has found the dagger. It is as if the party, going down the avenue, had flung it in.

"Bungler," Superintendent Ferrick says again. "It's bad enough to be a murderer without being a fool."

He takes the dagger. No doubt about the work it has done. It is incrusted with blood—dry, dark, and clotted up to the hilt. A strong, sure hand had certainly done the deed. For the first time the thought strikes him—could a woman's hand strike that one strong, sure, deadly blow? Miss Catheron is a fragile-looking young lady, with a waist he could span, slim little fingers, and a delicate wrist. Could she strike this blow—it is quite evident only one has been struck.

"And besides," says Superintendent Ferrick, argumentatively to himself, "it's fifteen minutes' fast walking from the house to the gates. Fifteen minutes only elapse between the time Nurse Pool sees her come out of the nursery and Maid Ellen finds her mistress murdered. And I'll be sworn, she hasn't been out of the house to-day. All last night they say she kept herself shut up in her room. Suppose she wasn't—suppose she went out last night and tried to hide it, is it likely—come, I say! is it likely, she would take and throw it right in the very spot, where it was sure to be found? A Tartar that young woman is, I have no doubt, but she's a long way off being a fool. She may know who has done this murder, but I'll stake my professional reputation, in spite of Mrs. Pool, that she never did it herself."

A thin, drizzling rain comes on with the night, the trees drip, drip in a feeble, melancholy sort of way, the wind has a lugubrious sob in its voice, and it is intensely dark. It is about nine o'clock, when Miss Catheron rises from her place by the sick-bed and goes out of the room. In the corridor she stands a moment, with the air of one who looks, and listens. She sees no one. The dark figure of a woman, who hovers afar off and watches her, is there, but lost in a shadowy corner; a woman, who since the murder, has never entirely lost sight of her. Miss Catheron does not see her, she takes up a shawl, wraps it about her, over her head, walks rapidly along the passage, down a back stairway, out of a side door, little used, and so out into the dark, dripping, sighing night.

There are the Chesholm constabulary on guard on the wet grass and gravel elsewhere—there is none here. But the quiet figure of Jane Pool has followed her, like her shadow, and Jane Pool's face peers cautiously out from the half-open door.

In that one instant while she waits, she misses her prey—she emerges, but in the darkness nothing is to be seen or heard.

As she stands irresolute, she suddenly hears a low, distinct whistle to the left. It may be the call of a night-bird—it may be a signal.

She glides to the left, straining her eyes through the gloom. It is many minutes before she can see anything, except the vaguely waving trees—then a fiery spark, a red eye glows through the night. She has run her prey to earth—it is the lighted tip of a cigar.

She draws near—her heart throbs. Dimly she sees the tall figure of a man; close to him the slender, slighter figure of a woman. They are talking in whispers, and she is mortally afraid of coming too close. What is to keep them from murdering her too?

"I tell you, you must go, and at once," are the first words, she hears Inez Catheron speaking, in a passionate, intense whisper. "I tell you I am suspected already; do you think you can escape much longer? If you have any feeling for yourself, for me, go, go, I beseech you, at once! They are searching for you now, I warn you, and if they find you——"

"If they find me," the man retorts, doggedly, "it can't be much worse than it is. Things have been so black with me for years, that they can't be much blacker. But I'll go. I'm not over anxious to stay, Lord knows. Give me the money and I'll be off."

She takes from her bosom a package, and hands it to him; by the glow of the red cigar-tip Jane sees her.

"It is all I have—all I can get, jewels and all," she says; "enough to keep you for years with care. Now go, and never come back—your coming has done evil enough, surely."

Jane Pool catches the words—the man mutters some sullen, inaudible reply. Inez Catheron speaks again in the same passionate voice.

"How dare you say so?" she cries, stamping her foot. "You wretch! whom it is o'clock was it, I say, when you went up to the nursery?"

Ellen Butters (excitedly).—It was about a quarter or twenty minutes past eight—how can I know any surer when I don't know. I don't carry a watch and didn't look at the clock. I'm sure I never expected to be badgered about it in this way. I said I'd go and wake my lady up, and not leave her there to catch her death, in spite of fifty Miss Catherons. I rapped at the door and got no answer, then I opened it and went in. There was no light, but the moon was shining bright and clear, and I saw my lady sitting, with her shawl around her in the arm-chair. I thought she was asleep and called her—there was no answer. I called again, and put my hand on her bosom to arouse her. Something wet my hand—it was blood. I looked at her closer, and saw blood on her dress, and oozing in a little stream from the left breast. Then I knew she had been killed. I ran screaming from the room, and down among the rest of the servants. I told them—I didn't know how. And I don't remember any more, for I fell in a faint. When I came to I was alone—the rest were up in the nursery. I got up and joined them—that's everything I know about it."

Ellen Butters retired, and William Hooper was called. This is Mr. Hooper's evidence:

"I have been butler in Sir Victor Cather-

Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of the Lennox and Addington Mutual Fire Insurance Company was held in the council chamber, Napanee, on Saturday, the 26th inst. On account of the severe storm and the inclemency of the weather the attendance was very small. The president, J. B. Aylsworth, occupied the chair, and after a few congratulatory remarks to the members upon the very satisfactory financial condition of the company, called upon secretary to read the minutes of the last annual meeting, which were adopted. The secy, M. C. Bogart, gave a brief outline of the auditors and directors annual report to the policy holders, referring to the average cost of insurance for the eighteen years, being 78 3/10 cents for $100 for three years, that the company had paid, in losses, since 1882, $19,576.20. The company's cash assets at the close of the year were $821.47 besides the residue on their premium notes and the only liability being an unadjusted loss of $150; that never in the Co's history were the finances in a more satisfactory condition than at present, and the policy holders more secure; that the Co. grants the most liberal and satisfactory policy to the farmers, and as a result the company issued more policies in December than ever in the history of the company for the corresponding month. Messrs. J. B. Aylsworth and I. F. Aylsworth were elected directors, and J. Jackson, Auditor, for the year 1895. At a subsequent meeting of the directors J. B. Aylsworth and B. C. Lloyd were re elected president and Vice-President of the Board, M. C. Bogart, Sec'y.-Treas., and J. N. McKim, of Napanee, and J. F. Brickman, of Camden East, agents of the company.

The offertory collections in aid of the Foreign Mission Fund, which were cancelled last Sunday on account of the great storm, will be taken up, morning and evening, next Sunday, 3rd Feb., in St. John's church.

The Kirmess at Newburgh on Tuesday was a great success. Owing to the bad roads no doubt many were prevented from being in attendance. Miss Wilson, of Kingston, who appeared for the first time, acquitted herself as an elocutionist to the admiration and delight of the audience and may be sure of a hearty welcome whenever she appears in Newburgh again. The tableaus, flower drill and grand national dance also deserve special mention. Proceeds about $45.

HE MISSED BILL.

For Which Reason the Sheriff Was Sorely Disappointed.

About a mile and a half out of a small town in Texas I came to a house by the roadside with a man sitting on the fence in front, and I stopped to get some information as to the forks of the road about three hundred yards further along.

"Jou come from town?" he asked when he had answered my question.

"Yes."

"Jou meet a man twixt here and thar?"

"A man on a gray horse?"

"He's the one. What did he say to you?"

"Nothing, except 'good morning.'"

"Jou say anything back?"

"Nothing, except what he had said to me. Why? Who was he?"

"He was the sheriff and I thought mebbe he might 'a' had somethin' to say about me."

"Why, what have you been doing?"

"Nothin'."

"You don't look like a bad man."

"I'm too good for the country. I wish sometimes I was wuss."

"What did the sheriff want with you?"

"Wanted to arrest me."

"Why?"

"I shot at that sneakin', hoss-stealin' Bill McGee last night."

"But you didn't hit him for I saw him in town, drunk, just as I left."

"That's what he was goin' to arrest me fer. He said it was a penetinsherry offense to miss Bill."

That kind of law seemed to me rather funny, in a way and I laughed,

"I couldn't help it," he added apologetically. "The dern gun was loaded with birdshot and I thought they was buck shot."

"And why didn't he arrest you?" I asked with considerable curiosity.

"Oh," he replied with an earnest desire to be put on terms with the official quite apparent in his tones, "the sheriff is a mighty good feller, and when I told him I had the gun loaded now with slugs and a musket ball, he said he'd give me a week longer and he hoped I wouldn't disapp'int him, fer he had too much respeck fer my fam'ly to have to take the law on me. Jou say Bill was very drunk when you saw him?"

I assured him that Bill was just about right to be ugly and he shook my hand gratefully as I started away.

The Wrong State.

A gentleman of the shabby-genteel type ambled genially up to the horse reporter's desk and with a confident smile stood their bowing.

"Well, what is it?" inquired the reporter.

"I have here," sir," he replied, taking a small package from his pocket, "a device for saving life, to which I desire to call your attention. I presume you have no objection to saving your life or that of any of your fellow creatures."

"None whatever."

"And I may expect you to give my device the consideration its merits deserve?"

"Certainly. What is it?"

"There it is, sir," said the visitor, taking a corkscrew from the wrapper and laying it on the desk.

The reporter threw up his hands.

"Come off," he exclaimed, "that won't go here. This ain't Kentucky," and the visitor with a look of disappointment picked up his device and headed for the

We are glad to state that Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Herrington are improving after a severe illness.

Our school is improving favorably under the able management of Mrs. Annie Edgar.

DENBIGH.

The Lutheran parsonage at our village was discovered to be on fire about 9 o'clock on last Thursday evening. As soon as the alarm was given, a large number of able and willing persons were at hand, and doing their utmost to extinguish the flames, but it soon became apparent that the building was doomed and that the only thing which could be done was to save the contents and to confine the fire to the burning house. Fortunately it was a calm night and plenty of men and teams on the spot (as a prayer meeting was held that evening at the Methodist church) to carry and draw water, of which there is a scarcity on the premises, or it would have been impossible to save the outbuildings and perhaps even the church from destruction. The church parsonage and outbuildings belonging to the Lutheran Congregation are insured in the London Mutual Fire Insurance Co. for very little (if any) more than half their actual value. The parsonage was insured for $400. The contents were the private property of the resident minister in charge of this mission, Rev. G. Brackebush, who carried no insurance. Although most of the contents of the house were saved from the fire, many articles are badly damaged, and others, which are supposed or known to have been carried out, are as yet missing, so that the actual loss sustained by Mr. Brackebush cannot at present be accurately ascertained. The rev. gentleman and his family are temporarily domiciled at the house of Mr. Adolph Fritsch, but will in a few days remove to the dwelling adjoining Paul Stein's general store. A building committee will probably be appointed at once, and steps taken to build a new parsonage, as soon as suitable material can be supplied. It is most encouraging and gratifying, to notice the general sympathy and friendly feeling manifested by everybody. A number of friends who are not members of the Lutheran congregation, have already volunteered to assist in rebuilding.

We had excellent sleighing during all this month and a large number of farmers took advantage of the good roads last week and went to Renfrew after flour and general supplies. Among them were: Messrs. Chas. Stein, Gustas Stein, Joseph Rankin, William John Erdman Berndt, Edward Petzold and Reinhold Petzold. Chas. P. Stein and Wm. Kerr also went last week to Galetta after a run of millstones &c, purchased by Paul Stein to be put in the Denbigh grist mill. They all came together, and were caught in a regular blizzard, which raged here last Saturday, and were only able to reach Denbigh late in the evening, with teams nearly exhausted.

John Ferguson M.P., for South Renfrew, passed through our village last week on a visit to his lumber shanties in Ashby township. Edward Mackay Esq., of the firm of "Carswell and MacKay," Renfrew, also passed through on his way to his shanties west of this place.

of William Grange. Boys are more or less impressionable and the years are not long enough to wear away these early convictions. If anyone were to ask me to-day if I knew a thoroughly good man, my mind would at once produce from somewhere the impression of William Grange as I knew him in Newburgh. He occupied this place in my regard, even though he is now dead, because for the many years I knew him, I never heard anyone say an unkind word about him, I never heard him speak roughly, I found him always charitable, generous, and a true friend in time of trouble. I respected and liked him not only because he was a universal favorite but for the greater reason that his gentle nature and his sterling honesty demanded my individual respect and esteem. He was a good man. There were no little hypocrises, no shoddy veneer, and no fickleness about him. He was a plain every day friend whom you could confide in as confidently as to a churchman. He possessed always a youthful heart and though disease haunted him for many years, he was always the sturdy champion of athletics. His drugstore in Newburgh, I remember was headquarters for the baseball club and for all local sports, fishing, hunting, and the like. The men, old and young, who used to gather in that store of an evening for a smoke and friendly gossip will back me up, every soul of them when I say we are sorry he is gone, that we sadly miss his genial face and that the village never was prouder of any of its citizens than of William Grange. He was a thoroughly good man, I again repeat, for I admire the type. There are so many nowadays whom we find to be egotistical, selfish, boastful men, who don't wear well, that we can appreciate a good, plain, square man, and tie to him, seeking to fashion our lives after his. I have long expected his death, but I am very sorry that it came. He was still a young man and he loved life. Why should he not? The world is a mighty pleasant place to live in when you make your own sunshine. I wish him good bye. I should like to say it over his grave.

The meanest man on record is said to live in Port Hope. He sold his sister-in-law one-half interest in a cow, and then refused to divide the milk, maintaining that he sold only the front half. The buyer was also required to provide the feed the cow consumed, and was compelled to carry water to her three times a day. Recently the cow hooked the old man, and he is suing the son-in-law for damages.

Diligent search has failed to disclose the identity of the miscreant who picked up, bodily, one of Cobourg's nicest society young gentlemen and buried him in a snow bank, one night last week.

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

DORLAND.

We have had some very fine weather for the past week. Our prophet says an early spring.

Mr. Peter Hanlon lost a very valuable horse last week, valued at fifty dollars.

Herb says that he done Fred up in fine shape on Sunday night and says he can do it again.

Herbert Gallagher is talking of going to California for his health, as it has been very bad of late.

Miss Rikley has returned home after an absence of two weeks.

Our school teacher, Miss Johnson, is getting along fine with her school.

Mr. Hawley says that he is not going to put the steam heater in his shed this winter. That is bad for you Peter.

Mr. Fournia and Rikley have got all their timber on the ice and are now drawing to Picton, Rumor says a wedding soon, look out Jim.

CENTREVILLE WEST.

We have had very moderate weather during the last few days, and our roads, which have been blocked by last week's snow storm have got quite passable again.

Cheese meetings and cheese factories are the principal topic of conversation around here. The annual meeting held at Centreville on the 26th inst., was well attended from this section, and when the factory reopens we may expect to see our old reliable "Milk man" once more. He has filled this position successfully for a number of years. Nothing succeeds like success.

Balls and parties are at an end for this season. A great many attended them all, and report a good time.

Sugar-making will soon commence, then for our annual sugar social.

Cutting the summer's wood seems to occupy the attention of the farmer's at present. Several have their statute labor completed through shoveling snow.

It is stated that the next excitement we will have will be a "General Election."

PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY.

John C. Benson, Sophiasburg, has just returned home from a week's visit with friends in Belleville and vicinity.

Miss Addie Williamson, Bloomfield, is visiting friends at Elm Brook and Yerexville, this week.

Lydia Barker, wife of Matthew Benson, a well known hop-grower of this county, departed this life Saturday, Feb. 23rd. The remains will be placed in the vault, Picton. Deceased has been labouring under the delusions of a disordered mind for the past ten years.

La Grippe has made its appearance here this winter in various forms, and many have had cause to fear the name and effects of this dread disease.

A letter dated at Lodi, Cal. Feb 17th, just received reads, "This morning the sun is shining beautifully. We have no fire in the sitting-room and the temperature is 68 degrees, not very cold for February is it?"

Mr. E. Weldon Sherrif, of the Picton Gazette staff was married on Wednesday Feb. 20th, to Miss Ethel May Hurst, daughter of Mr. T. M. Hurst, DENBIGH.

For the third time during the past few months we have to record the loss of a dwelling house in this vicinity by fire, after we have for many years been singularly excempt from the ravages of the fire fiend. This time it is Mr. Richard Edwards, who resides on Lot No. 1, in the 16th con. of the Tp. of Denbigh, whose house with kitchen and other attachments, containing all his household goods, provisions, seed and feed grain, potatoes and roots, and most of the articles generally kept in a farmer's store house were totaly destroyed. Mr. and Mrs. Edwards were not at home during the fire, which occurred on the afternoon of Sunday the 17th inst. but were on a visit to Mrs. Edwards mother at this village, and the house was left in charge of their children, the eldest of whom is a girl twelve years of age. The house had no chimneys, the stove pipes passing straight through the roof and it is supposed that the roof caught fire in some way from one of the pipes. The fire had already advanced so far when noticed by the children, that they were only with difficulty able to rescue the bedding out of two beds, and as the buildings were rather isolated the neighbours arrived too late to save anything. There was no insurance on either building or contents, and Mr Edward's loss is very heavy. Fortunately he enjoys the esteem of all who know him, and the sympathy of many of his numerous friends has been practicably manifested by them, by according him such assistance as they are able to give.

Rev. Mr. Irvine, of Calabogie passed through our village last Friday.

Wm. Reiley representing Messrs Pratt and West of Ottawa called on our local merchant last Friday.

Henry Sibley and A. L. Stein were in Renfrew on business last week.

Fred Chatson is temporarily home from the shanty, being laid up with a sore hand.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Rose have returned home after paying a protracted visit to friends in Prince Edward County.

Edgar Horton, of Sydney, and Fred Slater of Tweed are visiting their many friends in the Scotch Settlement.

Other visitors: At the Denbigh House, Mr. Geo. Hamilton; at the Chatson House, Mr. Nelson Cassida, of Northbrook, Miss G. Cassida, Messrs J. & J. Carn, Joseph Jones, Silas Anderson and Mrs. Rodgers.

GULL CREEK.

The last two weeks has been moderate winter weather, not intensely cold, but cold enough to suit the most of us who are not very strong, and not much flesh to cover our bones for to shield us from the cutting weapons of monarch frost. We were very glad to feel some degrees of moderation, and we presume that the animal kind also enjoy it.

The roads are very good at present, and many are the hopes that they will continue for sometime to be good for to draw fodder from near and far distance, as a great number will have to do so. Fodder is a very scarce article around this part of the county. The question is frequently heard "Do you know who has any hay to sell?" It was advertised that Mr. Coxall Tamworth had a few stacks of hay on sale up here on Mr. Robertson's marsh, probably that is gone before this, because I saw a party on their way there with the intention of securing it this very day.

There is some great attraction for the young, especially to Mr. Robert Herrington, who lives in Squire Whelan's house, where the Gull Creek Hotel stand used to be. It is well to be friendly and neighbourly, but it does not appear very well for a lot of boys and girls to stand near the road side surprising those that were passing and repassing by their crazy shouts, especially on Sabbath evening. We shall mention no names at present, trusting this hint will be sufficient.

Mr. John G. Lott has had a severe attack of inflammation in the bowels, but trust by timely aid that the worst is over.

Mr. Robert Webb has had a little daughter added to his family recently mother and child are doing well, and Bob is happy.

Mr. Abraham Lott is contemplating moving back to his old place before very long.

TAMWORTH.

Our usually quiet village presented quite a lively scene on Tuesday morning last, being the occasion of the marriage of two of our most popular young people, Mr. Murray Stinson and Miss Martha McGuire. The ceremony took place in Christ church at 10 a. m., the Rev. J. R. Serson officiating. The bride was neatly attired in a travelling dress of dark brown and was attended by her sister, Miss May McGuire, while Mr. Robert Stinson acted as groomsman. of time and money he has fought the National Policy tooth and nail, and if it is argued that he was not very successful it must be pointed out that it is the farmers themselves who are responsible for this, and not Mr. Allison, for he has been a forcible and able exponent of Liberalism. In two general elections he led the party to victory, and although in the bye-elections that followed the riding went with the Government, the same would have held good had the Liberals predominated in the Dominion, as bye-elections in close constituencies generally go with the party in power. The Reformers contend that it would have been more graceful for the Patron candidate to have withdrawn and left the field to Mr. Allison. He had the priority claim. His policy, and the policy of the Liberal party, is almost identical with that of the Patrons. For years before the Patrons of Industry had a foothold in Canada the grand old Liberal party was clamoring and agitating for the very reforms that the Patrons have been organized to secure, viz., economy in public expenditure, the abolition of all monopolies and combines, the removal of the excessive customs imposts that gives tariff protection to a few manufacturers at the expense of the many consumers. Moreover Mr. Allison is a farmer, and this fact should have induced the Patrons to withdraw their competition against him, as in serving their interests he would be serving his own. We would like to have seen Mr. Allison in the field but as fate has decreed otherwise we must bow to the enevitable.

What is the duty of the Reformers of Lennox under the circumstances? Can they consistently vote for Mr. Wilson, the N. P. candidate, who defends and condones the present corrupt Tory Government? Assuredly not. Mr. Switzer, the Patron candidate in Lennox, is an able man. He advocates the same reforms that the Liberals have been fighting to secure for years. Measures not men should be the gauge. We have all along advocated for free trade and the abolition of the present pernicious system of protection that is impoverishing our farmers and working classes for the benefit of a few monopolists and manufacturers. We desire the defeat of the present corrupt Dominion Government and the abolition of the iniquitious National Policy. We want these reforms and we care not by whom they are brought about so long as they are brought about. THE EXPRESS will give its support to the Patron candidate and do all in its power to bring about his election. We could not act otherwise and be consistent. It is the duty of every Reformer in Lennox to give his active support to Mr. Switzer in the oncoming election, for by so doing they will be assisting to bring about those great and much needed reforms that the Liberals have so long fought for.

THE SENATE VACANCY.

"A Lennox Elector" is the latest addition to our esteemed contemporary's list of semi-editorial swashbucklers. He may or may not be identical with the "Lennox Elector" of the Farmers'

If the Dominion Government would only leave the upper House to the ravages of time, Canadian Senators would without constitutional violence become as extinct as the buffalo that once roamed the prairies.

Hon Billa Flint is dead. THE EXPRESS is sorry that he is gone. He was an exceptionably able man, but despite his demise the dear old Senate has gone on pursuing the even tenor of its way much as usual. The Temperance cause of which Mr. Flint was an acknowledged representative has not suffered by the gap which his death occasioned. The Royal Prohibition Commision has met, and when the Government can borrow a little more money, the bills will be paid. The Senate has never been useful in either promoting or retarding legislation. Senators have only been active in drawing their pay and although we are sorry to see them die we would be equally sorry if the gaps that the grim reaber makes in their numbers is still to be filled at the national expense.

NAPANEE AND THE FARMERS.

To the Editor of The Express.

Dear Sir,—There has been, it would seem, a good deal of unfriendly feeling for a year or two past between some of the citizens of Napanee and the Patrons of Industry, or rather some of the Patrons, and no doubt foolish things have been said and done on both sides. I am not sure as to what the bottom cause of all this has been, but it is probably to be found, as usual, in the tenderest spot there is about the average man, and that is his pocket. The towns seem to have gotten it into their heads without good grounds, that the farmers, represented by the Patrons of Industry, were making a move inimical to their interests. The dealers in the towns got the idea that the prime object of the Patrons was to dispense with the so-called "middlemen" and get their goods at cheaper wholesale rates. It was quite natural under the circumstances that this class of the town citizens should take the alarm in accordance with that law of self-preservation which is so strong in humanity. But it is very questionable whether they took the wisest course towards warding off the threatened evil. Forgetting that the other side was just as strongly endowed with the instinct of self preservation as themselves and that the condition of the farmers was more desperate than their own, and forgetting also that the human, like the mule, can be much more readily led than driven,—forgetting these things, they began to denounce Patronism, and then some imprudent Patrons began to denounce "the middle men" and thus the folly went on.

Now, in the first place the prime object of the Patrons, as I understand Patronism, is not to injure the towns, even indirectly, not to interfere with the legitimate dealer, but to secure certain governmental and economic reforms, and thus obtain relief from the burdens now oppressing the townspeople as well as the farmers—but the latter primarily and especially. And, in the second place, if that were one of the objects of the Patrons the retail dealers could hardly blame them seeing that they are actually driven into it by sheer necessity—desperation is the word. How can the townspeople expect a liberal patronage from the farmers when the farmers are not in a position to patronize them? How can the dealers expect the farmers to buy of them when they have not got the money to buy? Three-fourths of them are paying interest on mortgages on their lands and on their chattels, and all of them, without exception, are paying tribute and taxes to the monopolies, the combines, the boodlers, the protectionists, till they have but little left to pay the grocer, the merchant, the shoemaker and the blacksmith. If the support the town receives from the to what good government consiste in is for such citizens to meet together on friendly terms in friendly discussion and compare notes and opinions. Of course there will be a few unreasonable Grits, a few unreasonable Tories, and a few unreasonable Patrons, who will kick against this; but the great majority in each of the three parties must be credited with the desire to BE right and to DO what is right and best for the public good. The open Convention of Wednesday (though a party Convention) was a long step in the right direction.

Now, if an interested spectator in that Convention should venture to make some comments here on its proceedings it will not I trust be improperly taking advantage of the generous privilege extended to outsiders to come in. Indeed, the liberal spirit which had in the first instance broken down the exclusive barricade at the door, asserted itself inside, and prevailed over the inconsiderable moiety of narrowness which manifested itself. Both town and county were well represented in the large meeting, and it was gratifying to note that there was a disposition on both sides to bury the hatchet, and come to a better understanding. The folly of town against country and country against town is becoming apparent. The chairman of the meeting being a townsman referred to the past ill feeling and misunderstanding, and took a moderate and conciliatory course which was creditable. Several other prominent citizens of Napanee took the same common-sense and conciliatory line in their addresses. The effect of all this was very good, and met with a hearty response from the farmers. As both sides are willing to bury the hatchet let it, by all means, be buried. The farmers will patronize Napanee to the full extent of their ability, and let Napanee increase that ability by assisting them to get the relief they are seeking. When the voters of Napanee are voting in the farmers interests they are voting in their own interests, for it is quite impossible for them to prosper as well when the farmer is in distress. The farmers not only of this county, but all over Canada, are now making another struggle in the approaching election for relief. Will the cities and towns assist them? I believe they will. The indications are all that way. Will Napanee assist the farmers of Lennox in this struggle. I believe Napanee will. After listening to the expression of some of her best citizens on Wednesday I have no reason to doubt that Napanee will stand shoulder to shoulder with the farmers upon whom they are principally depending for their patronage and support.

I regretted to find myself unable to agree on one point with a prominent and respected farmer in the meeting on Wednesday. He is not a Patron, and bore down pretty hard on Patronism notwithstanding that he accepts the Patron platform as being very good. His principal objection to Patronism appeared to be that it had taken it upon itself to come into existence at all. He contended that there was no good reason for its existence—there was no necessity for the Order. While I had no part in organizing Patronism I can easily see a very good reason for its existence. Let us look at the question squarely. The farmers all over the country are and have been for some time in a very bad way, and matters are continually growing worse. Three fourths of them are on the verge of bankruptcy. Our friend, being a farmer himself, knows this to be the case. And the chief cause of all this is the system of Protection which has made the farmer the victim of monopolies, combines and a fearful imposition of taxation which has crushed him to earth. Our friend (whom we will call for convenience Mr. H.) also knows this to be true. Very well, the farmers naturally sought relief from all the time, as it no doubt is, that is not the fault of the farmer, only in so far as he has been foolish enough to submit so long to carry the burdens his legislators have placed on him. The townspeople need not blame the farmers; nor need the farmers blame the townspeople. They are both in a bad plight. And they ought both to work together to get out of their plight. There is no good reason why they should be at variance and pull apart, while there is good reason why they should be on friendly terms and pull together.

As an outsider and spectator I attended the Liberal Convention in the town hall on Wednesday 20th. This was no intrusion, as the president of the Reform Association had publicly invited all friends of good government to attend whether members of their Association or not. That certainly was a step in the right direction, and it is to be presumed the Liberal Conservative Association of the county will follow the good example set by the other party. If both parties are in favor of good government (and who will question it?), and if neither party is thinking of engaging in any crooked work which it would be ashamed of, why should there be any secret conclaves? Why should not the "friends of good government" be welcome in at a party meeting? The Convention referred to above was actually a business Convention, in which officers were elected, and matters of great importance to the party holding it, as well as to the whole country, were freely discussed, yet there were present Reformers, Conservatives and Patrons. That was as it should be. They were all citizens, and presumably in favor of good government; and the best way to attain unanimity among citizens as from neither of the political parties. The party in power who could give them relief WOULD not, and the party out of power who would give them relief COULD not. Bear in mind the farmers of this country are made up politically of Patrons, Independents, Reformers and Conservatives. The Patrons are made up of Reformers, Conservatives and Independents. They are now (or ought to be) simply Patrons, and not partisans of any stripe. They are striving in unison as farmers for that relief which they could not get from either of the old political parties. The Conservative Patrons could not get it from their old party because the party WOULD not give it; while the Liberal Patrons could not get it from their old party because the party COULD not give it. Is that not a fact Mr. H.? And is that not a sufficient reason for the existence of Patronism? To my mind it is. The case is clear. Whatever mistakes the Patrons may have made, and whatever mistakes some of their writers and exponents are making (and they certainly are making mistakes in my judgment) their platform is, on the whole, a very good one; and their objects in seeking relief from oppression and corrupt government are also good.

and their existence for such a purpose is amply justified.

Mr. H., however, took the prudent and common-sense ground, and while he could not fully approve Patronism, or see a good reason for its existence, he realized the fact that it had an existence, and had to be dealt with as a stubborn fact; and he very wisely concluded to give his support to it as the best course before him. Many others will do the same. Conservatives as well as Reformers who are outside the Order will sympathise with its objects and vote for their own interests as farmers instead of the interests of party.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

The Jew's Harp.

Reference is made in the new "Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund," to a paragraph which appeared recently in The Daily News on the subject of that strangely named instrument the Jew's harp. Why a Jew's harp? it has often been asked, and no satisfactory solution, so far as we are aware, has ever been afforded. The writer in the Palestine Exploration Fund's organ thinks the term may be derived from "jeu-harpe," or toy harp. This suggestion is not new, for it is to be found in Richardson's Dictionary and other works of reference, but it is clearly inadmissable. In French "jouet" is a toy, not "jeu," and, moreover "jeu" is a substantive, and cannot possibly be employed as an adjective. It is more likely that Jew's harp is a corrnption of a word that had a somewhat similiar sound. It is not impossible that it is derived from the French word "guimbarde," which refers to the

THE FARM IN FEBRUARY

Winter Shelter for Stock—When Well Protected From Cold, Cattle Do Not Need to Generate Extra Heat and so Are Less Expensive.

Feed costs more in winter than in summer, not only because there is a smaller supply, but also for the reason that more labor is necessary to give it to stock. It is also more expensive because a large share of it must be devoted to counteracting the effects of the cold. Animals have no stoves to give them warmth, but must derive their warmth entirely from the food, and the colder the weather the more warmth is required, hence the larger the proportion of food necessary to supply the warmth, and consequently there is a greater expense incurred by the farmers. Production, whether of meat, milk, wool or butter, can only occur when the animal has first supplied its own wants. It is true that a cow will produce milk on an apparently small quantity of food on a cold day, but it is at the expense of a corresponding loss of fat or tissue from her body. There is combustion occurring within her, though slowly, and the fuel must be provided in some form, or she will succumb because combustion must sooner or later cease.

SAVE THE FUEL.

The warmer the animal can be kept without resorting to extra fuel (feed) the less expense. This can be done only with good shelter. It is not inferred that barns are the proper shelter, as they are well enough in their place, but cattle are turned out of the barns, or allowed in the barnyard, where they suffer severely. They dislike confinement, preferring the open air and are more profitable when their wishes are gratified, but they should have a large open shed, or windbrake of some kind to keep off the cold winds. Even the barns may contain cracks and crevices which let in cold streams of air on the stock at night and chill them severely. These openings though costing but little for their repair, entail not only discomfort to the animals but loss of product. More fuel must be used and in extreme cases the animals heat is not sufficient to maintain life, especially with young stock. Liberal feeding will not take the place

Setting the River on Fire

"Setting the Thames on fire" is an Remarkable Changes That Have Taken Place There During the Present Century.

There is no city, perhaps, in Europe in which so many surprising changes have taken place during the last three generations as in the capital of his Imperial Highness the Padishah Abdul Ahmid II.

Let it be for a moment supposed that Mr. Gladstone had visited Constantinople as an observant youth of seventeen; had he reached Stamboul in the middle of June, 1827, he would have been just in time to witness the last mutinous parade of the Janissaries, bearing aloft as a standard of revolt their historic soupkettles and their final massacre by order of the Sultan Mahmoud. The Janissaries wore turbans and caftans, and they preferred javelins and scimitars to the weapons of modern warfare. Twenty years before their final annihilation they themselves had massacred the Turkish troops whom the Sultan Selim, to his destruction, had subjected to European discipline and clad in European uniform.

In the Stamboul which might have been seen by the young English gentleman fresh from Eton there was a huge slave market, where not only white Georgian and Circassian girls were openly sold, but where crowds of Greek maidens captured by the Turks at Scio or in the Morea during the Greek war of independence were offered for sale. Mr. Gladstone might have seen at Stamboul that it was neither paved nor lighted.

He would have become acquainted with the peculiar conditions of Turkish diplomacy under which, whenever a war broke out between the Ottoman Empire and a Christian power, the first step taken by the Turkish Government was to seize the ambassador of the hostile country and immure him in the Castle of the seven Towers. He would have heard every day of Pashas and Effendis being decapitated or put to death by the application of bowstring; he would have witnessed, perhaps, the public infliction of the bastinado, or the more horrible torture of impalement. Vastly different is the Stamboul which the veteran statesman would gaze upon if he now journeyed to the shores of the Bosphorus.

When he was a young man there was not a single European hotel in Pera, and British travelers had to seek hospitality from their consul or at the houses of wealthy Franks. The Constantinople of to-day not only boasts an abundance of hotels, but it positively possesses a railway terminus. The Turkish ladies are still veiled, but they drive about in smart broughams instead of clumsy "aravas" drawn by oxen, and it is understood that in the luxurious seclusion of the harem they prefer to wear the toilets of Paris and Vienna rather than those which Turkish "Khanums" donned in the days when they welcomed Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. Indeed, so completely has the garb of Ottoman ministers and courtiers been transformed that there exists at Stamboul a collection, got together by the Government, of lay figures dressed in the flowing robes still with embroidery and the prodigious turbans prescribed by sumptuary etiquette in the first years of the century, and modelled from the garb won by Turkish grandees in the days of Mahomet the Conqueror—London Telegraph.

same instrument, or possibly from the word, unknown, whence this was derived. The difference between "guimbarde" and and Jew's harp is, after all, less than that between "evenque" and "bishop," which are both from "episcopus." The tendency to convert unknown words into words that are known is very common, and may be illustrated by "sparrowgrass" from asparagus.—London Daily News,

Nicely Caught,

Mr. Robert Ganthony once asked Mr. Weedon Grossmith to read a play he had written. Mr. Grossmith took the comedy, but lost it on his way home. "Night after night," he said, "I would meet Ganthony, and he would ask me how I liked his play. It was awful! The perspiration used to come out on my forehead, as I'd say sometimes I hadn't had time to look at it yet; or, again, that the first act was good; later, that the second wouldn't 'quite do,' but really I couldn't stop to explain. So sorry—must catch a train! I didn't so much mind lying, only it was difficult thinking up new lies appropriate to the case." Some months passed, and Ganthony still pursued without mercy. At last Mr. Grossmith searched his house once more, before it occurred to him that he might have left the comedy in his cab going home. He went down to Scotland Yard and inquired. "Oh, yes," was the reply—"play marked with Mr. Ganthony's name sent back to owner four months ago, as soon as found!"—Household Words.

In Darkest England.

The report of the "Darkest England" scheme for 1884 gives the following interesting facts: London contains 100,000 paupers, 30,000 abandoned women, 37,000 homeless adults and 35,000 slum children, while 10,000 new criminals are added each year. The Salvation Army, through this work, has 5,400 homeless men and women in its shelter every night. The food depots distributed during ten months 2,500,000 meals. In connection with the refuges are seven labor factories, which constantly employ about 1,000 men and 250 women. The farm colony has been successful, both in furnishing employment to those out of work and in netting to itself a profit of several hundred pounds.

Liberal feeding will not take the place of shelter at all times, for not only are the animals chilled but disease follows.

ECONOMY OF SHELTER.

The recent snowstorm should afford an object lesson in favor of shelter, and a consideration of the cost of sheds or repair of barns, will convince any farmer that $100 expended in that direction will return the outlay in a single winter. Where a large herd or flock is kept the saving of only 10 per cent. of the food during an entire winter will not only pay for all needed shelter but greatly increase production and improve the health of the animals. Next to the shelter is abundant bedding, in order to shut off the draught of cold air along the floor. Every ounce of food saved adds to the profit, and the warmer the animals the more rapid their growth and increase of weight. Warmth is the best cure for diseases, and it is economical to obtain it from shelter more than from food. Shelter is cheap because it serves the required purpose for many years, its real cost being but a small sum if its benefit is apportioned over a long period of time.

SHORT TALKS WITH FARMERS.

"Novelties" in Potatoes—The Southern Cow Pea—Notes.

Do not pay high prices for a few pounds of tubers of some new potato that may have many claims in its favor unless you are sure of its excellence and even then it would be well to wait until it has been given a test for several years, as many varieties may be unreliable in some sections. Novelties in seeds, fruits and vegetables are brought out every year, but they sometimes happen to be old varieties with new names. They spring into existence as novelties one year and sink out of sight in two or three seasons.

The Southern cow pea is a better crop for plowing under than rye, and is nearly equal to clover in many respects. It is, like corn, a summer crop, however and the seed cannot be planted until the ground is well warmed. It seems to thrive on any soil that will produce corn.

The hogs that have not yet been slaughtered will prove expensive during this cold month, as it requires too much corn to keep them supplied with warmth.

The Michigan Experiment Station has been experimenting with rape, and reports that one acre of rape will support nine lambs and produce a gain of 191 pounds in seven weeks. It is a summer crop, being sown in drills, in July.

With clover is one of the best foods for sheep, and it affords excellent pasturage for cows. It is also a honey-producing plant, and the bees can work on it, although they cannot procure honey from the red variety.

As soon as the snow clears away it will be advisable to make preparation for applying fertilizers to the strawberry beds. If the land is liable to be washed by heavy rains it will be well to delay the work until later, but it should be done before the new shoots begin to appear.

Judging of the value of an animal by its weight will not enable the owner to learn if the animal affords a profit. It is the cost of the animal that gives the value. A small animal may give a larger profit than one that is heavier because its cost is proportionately much less.

Many animals cease to thrive, simply because they require a food more succulent than the continued diet of grain and hay. A few carrots, a mess of potatoes or turnips, cooked, or even ensilage, occasionally, will make quite a difference in the appetite, and, consequently, do much to promote thrift. Medicine is frequently given when a succulent mess would accomplish all that may be desired.

Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam cures Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis and all Throat and Lung Troubles

"Setting the Thames on fire" is an oft heard saying, but probably few people know its origin, concerning which the following explanation has been given. In the time of our forefathers corn was ground in a rough instrument called a "temse." This was merely a stone hollowed out to receive the corn, with a piece of wood passed through it, which, being rapidly turned, ground the corn to flour. If the wooden handle was turned with sufficient force, the friction of the wood against the stone would cause the stick to catch fire, but as it required considerable energy to produce this effect the person who could accomplish it was thought smart, and he who could "set the temse on fire" was pretty sure to be a good worker in other ways. After a time the "temse" was superseded by better machinery.

Manufacture of Artificial Silk.

The manufacture of artificial silk is making rapid progress in France. At first cotton was the material employed in its manufacture, but in recent years wood pulp has been substituted. From this is obtained a nitrocellulose, which is first dissolved in ether and alcohol, and denitrated by means of sulphuric and acetic acid. This gives a product no more inflammable than ordinary cotton. It is now drawn into a thread and woven. The silk as manufactured on a large scale is grayish white in color, and possesses a high degree of lustre. Experiments with a testing machine show, however, that it is deficient in two important properties possessed by natural silk, namely, strength and elasticity. It also absorbs moisture to a much greater extent. It is difficult to distinguish in appearance the artificial from the product of the silk worm.

THE GREAT SALE

—OF—

HINCH & CO'S BANKRUPT STOCK

GATHERS STRENGTH and volume as it proceeds. The rush has been something unprecedented in the Dry Goods business, and the sales phenominal. Who said it was hard times? and that people had no money. It seems people had it laid away, "salted down," and it only required the price inducements we are offering at this great sale to call it forth and send it on its errand of usefulness. Here is a temptation for money savers. You can invest all you like in good, serviceable goods, just what you need for the next six months, at a saving of from 35 to 50 per cent. Shrewd men and careful women see it, and are laying in a supply of goods at prices that will perhaps never be heard of again.

☞ THESE ARE SOME OF THE BARGAINS:

No. 1. A lot of Children's Ulsters and Jackets to be cleared at 50c,
No. 2. A table spread with Ladies' Cloth and Jersey Jackets, your choice for 75c.
No. 3. Another table covered with splendid Jackets, 26 and 27 inches long, worth regularly from $7 to $20, to be sold at $1 each
No. 4 Still another lot, 32 inches long, to be sold at $2 each (piles of these have been sold this week.)
No. 5. A lot of $2 Mantle Cloths to be cleared at $1.20; the $1 25 quality for 77c.
No. 6. The entire stock of Furs, which must be closed out during the next two weeks, $4,500 worth. "The early bird gets the worm." "First come, first choice."
No. 7. The stock of Cloths and Tweeds, which must go quick.
No. 8. The entire Dress Goods stock, without reserve. Prices are doing it. That counter looks as if "struck with a cyclone" every day. $20 Robe Dresses at $5 is helping to do it.
No. 9. Readymade Clothing and Overcoats, must be sold at once.
No. 10. Gent's Furnishing Stock, selling retail at less than wholesale prices.

We have been too busy to show or speak of any VERY SPECIAL BARGAIN; in fact they have been lost sight of in the rush. These will be brought forward now. There are as big and bigger bargains to come, so don't think they will be all gone before you get here. $30,000 worth of goods are not sold in a week or two. The rush has been great but it will be greater when the sleigh loads of parcels that have gone out reach the different neighbourhoods. We have more faith in that kind of advertising than in printer's ink, however potent.

CHAPTER III.

ONE MOONLIGHT NIGHT.

The pleasant days went on—April went out—May came in. On the tenth of May, the Stuart family, Sir Victor Catheron, and Lady Helena Powyss were to sail from New York for Liverpool.

To Edith, fresh from the twilight of her country life, these days and nights had been one bewildering round of excitement and delight. Opera, theatre, dinner and evening parties, shopping, driving, calling, receiving—all that goes to make the round of that sort of life, had been run. Her slender wardrobe had been replenished, the white Swiss had been reinforced by half-a-dozen glistening silks; the corals, by a set of rubies and fine gold. Mr. Stuart might be pompous and pretentious, but he wasn't stingy, and he had insisted upon it for his own credit. And half-a-dozen "spandy new" silks, fresh from Stewart's counters, with the pristine glitter of their bloom yet upon them, were very different from one half-worn amber tissue of Trixy's. Miss Darrell took the dresses and the rubies, and looked uncommonly handsome in both.

On the last night but one, of their stay in New York, Mrs. Featherbrain gave a last "At Home," a sort of "P. P. C." party, Trixy called it. Miss Darrell was invited, and said nothing at the time, unless tossing the card of invitation contemptuously out of the window can be called saying something; but at the last moment she declined to go.

"My head is whirling now, from a surfeit of parties," she said to Miss Stuart. "Aunt Chatty is going to stay at home, and so shall I. I don't like your Mrs. Featherbrain—that's the truth—and I'm not fashionable enough yet to sham friendship with women I hate. Besides, Trix dear, you know you were a little—just a little—jealous of me, the other night at Roosevelt's. Sir Victor danced with me once oftener than he did with you. Now, you dear old love, I'll let you have a whole baronet to yourself, for this night, and who knows what may happen before morning?"

Miss Edith Darrell was one of those young persons — happily rare — who, when they take a strong antipathy, are true to it, even at the sacrifice of their own pleasure. In her secret soul, she was jealous of Mrs. Featherbrain. If she and Charley carried on their imbecile flirtation, at least it would not be under her disgusted eyes.

Miss Stuart departed—not the lilies of the field—not Solomon in all his glory—not the Queen of Sheba herself, ever half so magnificent. Charley went with her, a placid martyr to brotherly duty. And Edith went down to the family sitting-room where Aunt Chatty (Aunt Chatty by request) sat dozing in her after-dinner chair.

"We are going to have an 'At home' all to our two selves to night, auntie," Edith said, kissing her thin cheek; "and I am going to sing you to sleep, by way of beginning."

She was fond of Aunt Chatty—a meek soul, born to be tyrannized over, and tyrannized over, from her very cradle. One of those large women, who obey their small husbands in fear and trembling, who believe everything they are told, who "bless the squire and his relations, and live contented with their stations;" who are bullied by their friends, by their children, by their servants, and who die meekly some day, and go to Heaven.

Edith opened the piano and she began to play. She was looking very handsome to-night, in green silk and black lace, one half-shattered rose in her hair. She looked handsome at least so the young man who entered unobserved, and stood looking at her, evidently thought.

She had not heard him enter, but presently some mesmeric rapport between them, told her he was near. She turned her head and saw him. Aunt Chatty caught sight of him, in her semi-sleeping state, at the same moment.

"Dear me, Charley," his mother said, "you here? I thought you went to Mrs. Featherbrain's?"

"So I did," replied Charley. "I went—I saw—I returned—and here I am, if you and Dithy will have me for the rest of the evening."

"Edith and I were very well off without you. We had peace, and that is more than we generally have when you and she come together. You shall be allowed to stay only on one condition, and that is that you don't quarrel."

"I quarrel?" Charley said, lifting his eyebrows to the middle of his forehead. "My dear mother, your mental blindness on many points, is really deplorable. It's all Edith's fault—all; one of the few fixed tion, and is fatiguing in the extreme. Our first meeting," continued Mr. Stuart, stretching himself out leisurely on a sofa, "at which, Edith fell in love with me at sight, was a row. Well, if it wasn't a row, it was an unpleasantness of some sort. You can't deny, Miss Darrell, there was a coolness between us. Didn't we pass the night in a snow-drift? Since then, every other meeting has been a succession of rows. In justice to myself, and the angelic sweetness of my own disposition, I must repeat, the beginning, middle, and ending of each, lies with her. She will bully, and I never could stand being bullied—I always knock under. But I warn her—a day of retribution is at hand. In self-defence I mean to marry her, and then, base miscreant, beware! The trodden worm will turn, and plunge the iron into her own soul. May I ask what you are laughing at, Miss Darrell!

"A slight confusion of metaphor, Charley—nothing more. What have you done with Trix?"

"Trix is all right in the matronly charge of Mrs. Featherbrain, and engaged ten deep to the baronet. By the bye, the baronet was inquiring for you, with a degree of warmth and solicitude, as unwelcome as it was uncalled for. A baronet for a brother-in-law is all very well—a baronet for a rival is not well at all. Now, my dear child, try to overcome the general nastiness of your cranky disposition, for once, and make yourself agreeable. I knew you were pining on the stem for me at home, and so I threw over the last crush of the season, made Mrs. Featherbrain my enemy for life, and here I am. Sing us something."

Miss Darrell turned to the piano with a frown, but her eyes were smiling, and in her secret heart she was well-content. Charley was beside her. Charley had given up the ball and Mrs. Featherbrain for her. It was no use denying it, she was fond of Charley. Of late it had dawned dimly and deliciously upon her that Sir Victor Catheron was growing very attentive. If so wildly improbable a thing could occur, as Sir Victor's falling in love with her, she was ready at any moment to be his wife; but for the love which alone makes marriage sweet and holy, which neither time, nor trouble, nor absence can change—that love she felt for her cousin Charley, and no other mortal man.

It was a very pleasant evening—how pleasant, Edith did not care to own, even to herself. Aunt Chatty dozed sweetly in her arm-chair, she in her place at the piano, and Charley taking comfort on his sofa, and calmly and dispassionately finding fault with her music. That those two could spend an evening, an hour together, without disagreeing, was simply an utter impossibility. Edith invariably lost her temper—nothing earthly ever disturbed Charley's. Presently, in anger and disgust, Miss Darrell jumped up from the piano-stool, and protested she would play no more.

"To be told I sing Kathleen Mavourneen flat, and that the way I hold my elbows when I play Thalberg's 'Home,' is frightful to behold, I will not stand! Like all critics, you find it easier to point out one's faults, than to do better. It's the very last time, sir, I'll ever play a note for you!"

But, somehow, after a skirmish at euchre, at which she was ignobly beaten, and, I must say, shamefully cheated, she was back at the piano, and it was the clock striking twelve that made her start at last.

"Twelve! Goodness me. I didn't think it was half-past ten!" Mr. Stuart smiled, and stroked his mustache with calm complacency. "Aunt Chatty, wake up! It's midnight—time all good little women were in bed."

"You need not hurry yourself on that account, Dithy," Charley suggests, "if the rule only applies to good little women."

Miss Darrell replies with a glance of scorn, and wakes up Mrs. Stuart.

"You were sleeping so nicely I thought it a pity to wake you sooner. Come, auntie dear, we'll go upstairs together. You know we have a hard day's work before us to-morrow. Good-night, Mr. Stuart."

"Good-night, my love," Mr. Stuart responded, making no attempt to stir. Edith linked her strong, young arm in that of her sleepy aunt and led her upstairs. He lay and watched the slim green figure, the beautiful bright face, as it disappeared in a mellow flood of gaslight. The clear, sweet voice came floating saucily back:

"And Charley he's my darling,
My darling—my darling,
And Charley he's my darling,
The young Chevalier!"

All that was sauciest, and most coquettish in the girl's nature, came out with Charley. With Sir Victor, as Trixy explained it, she was "goody" and talked sense.

Mr. Stuart went back to the ball, and, I regret to say, made himself obnoxious to wife. Edith listened to the narration next day from the lips of Trix with surprise and disgust. Miss Stuart, on her own account, was full of triumph and happiness. Sir Victor had been most devoted, "most devoted," said Trix, in italics, "that is, for him. He danced with me very often, and he spoke several times of you, Dithy, dear. He couldn't understand why you absented yourself from the last party of the season—no more can I for that matter. A person may hate a person like poison—I often do myself—and yet go to that person's parties."

But this was a society maxim Miss Darrell could by no means be brought to understand. Where she liked she liked, where she hated she hated—there were no half measures for her.

The last day came. At noon, with a brilliant May sun shining, the ship fired her farewell guns, and steamed away for Merrie England. Edith leaned over the bulwark and watched the receding shore, with her heart in her eyes.

"Good-by to home," she said, "a smile on her lip, a tear in her eye." "Who knows when and how I may see it again. Who knows whether I shall ever see it?"

The luncheon bell rang; everybody—a wonderful crowd too—flocked merrily down stairs to the saloon, where two long tables, bright with crystal and flowers, were spread. What a delightful thing was an ocean voyage, and sea-sickness—bah!—merely an illusion of the senses.

After lunch, Charley selected the sunniest spot on deck for his resting-place, and the prettiest girl on board, for his companion, spread out his railway rug at her feet, spread out himself thereon, and prepared to be happy and be made love to. Trix, on the arm of the baronet, paraded the deck. Mrs. Stuart and Lady Helena buried themselves in the seclusion of the ladies' cabin, in expectation of the wrath to come. Edith got a camp-stool and a book, and hid herself behind the wheel-house for a little of private enjoyment. But she did not read; it was delight enough to sit and watch the old ocean smiling, and smiling like any other coquette, as though it could never be cruel.

The afternoon wore on; the sun dropped low, the wind arose—so did the sea. And presently—staggering blindly on Sir Victor's arm, pale as death, with speechless agony imprinted on every feature—Trixy made her appearance behind the wheel-house.

"O Edith, I feel awfully—awfully! I feel like death—I feel—"

She wrenched her arm from the baronet's, and rushed wildly to the side, and—Edith's dark, laughing eyes looked up into the blue ones, that no effort of Sir Victor's could quite control. The next moment she was by Trixy's side, leading that limp and pallid heroine below, whence, for five mortal days, she emerged not, nor did the eye of man rest on Miss Beatrix Stuart.

The weather was fine, but the wind and sea ran tolerably high, and of course everybody mostly was tolerably sick. One day's ordeal sufficed for Edith's tribute to old Neptune; after that, she never felt a qualm. A great deal of her time was spent in waiting upon Aunt Chatty and Trix, both of whom were very far gone indeed. In the case of Miss Stuart, the tortures of jealousy were added to the tortures of sea-sickness. Did Sir Victor walk with the young ladies on deck? Did he walk with her, Edith? Did he ever inquire for herself? Oh, it was shameful—shameful that she should be kept prostrate here, unable to lift her head! At this juncture, generally, in her excitement, Trixy did lift it, and the consequence was—woe.

It was full moon before they reached mid-ocean. How Edith enjoyed it, no words can tell. Perhaps it was out of merciful compassion to Trix, but she did not tell her of the long, brisk twilight, midday, and moonlight walks she and the baronet took on deck. How, leaning over the bulwarks, they watched the sun set, round and red, into the sea, and the silver sickle May moon rise, like another Aphrodite, out of the waves. She did not tell her, how they sat side by side at dinner, how he lay at her feet, and read aloud for her, in sheltered sunny nooks, how uncommonly friendly and confidential they became altogether, in these first half-dozen days out. People grow intimate in two days at sea, as they would not in two years on land. Was it all gentlemanly courtesy that fitful, feverish passion called love, described by the country swain as feeling "hot and dry like—with a pain in the side," she felt no particle. There was one, Mr. Charles Stuart, lying about in places, looking serene and sunburnt, who saw it all with sleepy, half-closed eyes, and kept his conclusions to himself. "Kismet!" he thought; "the will of Allah be done. What is written is written. Sea-sickness is bad enough, without the green-eyed monster. Even Othello, if he had been crossing in a Cunard ship, would have put off the pillow performance until they reached the other side."

One especial afternoon, Edith fell asleep after luncheon, on a sofa, in her own and Trixy's cabin, and slept through dinner and dessert, and only awoke with the lighting of the lamps. Trix lay, pale and wretched, gazing out of the porthole, at the glory of moonlight on the heaving sea, as one who sorrows without hope of consolation.

"I hope you enjoy your forty winks, Edith," she remarked; "what a Rip Van Winkle you are! For my part, I've never slept at all since I came on board this horrid ship! Now where are you going?"

"To get something to eat from my friend the stewardess," Edith answered; "I see I am too late for dinner."

Miss Darrell went, and got some tea and toast. Then wrapping herself in a blanket shawl, and tying a coquettish red wool hood over her hair, she ascended to the deck.

It was pretty well deserted by the ladies—none the worse for that, Edith thought. The full moon shone with untold splendor, over the vast expanse of tossing sea, heaving with that majestic swell, that never quite lulls on the mighty Atlantic. The gentlemen filled the smoking-room, the "Tabak Parliament" was at its height. She took a camp-stool, and made for her favorite sheltered spot behind the wheel-house. How grand it was—the starry sky, the brilliant white moon, the boundless ocean—that long trail of silvery radiance stretching miles behind. An icy blast swept over the deep, but, wrapped in her big shawl, Edith could defy even that. She forgot Sir Victor and the daring ambition of her life. She sat absorbed in the beauty and splendor of that moonlight on the sea. Very softly, very sweetly, half unconsciously, she began singing "The Young May Moon," when a step behind made her turn her head. It was Sir Victor Catheron. She awoke from her dream—came back to earth, and was of the world worldly, once more. The smile that welcomed him was very bright. She would have blushed if she could; but it is a disadvantage of pale brunettes that they don't blush easily.

"I heard singing, sweet and faint, and I give you my word, Miss Darrell, I thought it might be the Lurline, or a stray mermaid combing her sea-green locks. It is very beautiful, of course, but are you not afraid of taking cold?"

"I never take cold," Miss Darrell answered; "influenza is an unknown disease. Has the tobacco parliament broken up, that I behold you here?"

"It is half-past eleven—didn't you know it?—and all the lights are out."

"Good Heaven!" Edith cried, starting up aghast; "half past eleven! What will Trixy say? Really, moon-gazing must be sleeping the sleep of the just and the sea sick, blissfully unconscious of the traditions goings on about her. Edith looked at her with a sort of twinge. Was it fair, after all? was it strictly honorable? "Poor Trix," she said, kissing her softly, "I don't think it will be you!"

Next morning, at breakfast, Miss Darrell noticed that Mr. Stuart, junior, watched her as he sipped his coffee, with a portentous countenance that foreboded something. What it forebode came out presently. He led her on deck—offered her his arm for a morning constitutional, and opened fire thus wise:

"What were you and the baronet about on deck at abnormal hours of the night? What was the matter with you both?"

"Now, now," cried Edith, "how do you come to know anything about it? What business have small boys like you spying on the actions of their elders, when they should be safely tucked up, and asleep in their little beds?"

"I wasn't spying; I was asleep. I have no restless conscience to keep me prowling about at unholy hours."

"How do you come to know, then?"

"A little bird told me."

"I'll twist your little bird's neck! Who was it, sir? I command you."

"How she queens it already! Don't excite yourself, you small Amazon. It was the officer of the deck."

"The officer of the deck might be much better employed; and you may tell him so, with my compliments."

"I will; but you don't deny it—you were there!"

"I never deny my actions," she says with royal disdain; "yes, I was there."

"With Sir Victor—alone?"

"With Sir Victor—alone!"

"What did you talk about, Miss Darrell!"

"More than I care to repeat for your edification, Mr. Stuart. Have you any more questions to ask, pray?"

"One or two; did he ask you to marry him, Edith?"

"Ah, no!" Edith answers with a sigh that is genuine; "there is no such luck as that in store for Dithy Darrell. A baronet's bride—Lady Catheron! no, no—the cakes and ale of life are not for me."

"Would you marry him, if he did? Will you marry him when he does? for that is what it comes to, after all."

"Would I marry him? She looks at him in real incredulous wonder. "Would I marry Sir Victor Catheron—I? My dear Charley, when you ask rational questions, I shall be happy to answer them, to the best of my ability, but not such absurdity as that."

"Then, you will?"

"Charley, don't be a tease—what do young persons of your juvenile age know about such things? I don't like the turn this conversation has taken; let us change it, let us talk about the weather—that's always a safe subject. Isn't it a splendid morning? Isn't it charming to have a perpetual fair wind? And how are you going to account for it, that the wind is always fair going to England, and always ahead coming out?

"'England, my country—great and free Heart of the world—I leap to thee!'"

She sings, with a wicked look in her dark eyes, as she watches her cavalier.

Charley is not going to be put off, however; he declines to talk of either wind or weather.

"Answer my question, Edith, if you please. If Sir Victor Catheron asks you, will you be his wife?"

She looks at him calmly, steadily, the man she loves, and answers:

"If Sir Victor Catheron asks me, I will be his wife."

CHAPTER IV.

SHORT AND SENTIMENTAL.

Two days later, and Fastnet Rock looms up against the blue sky; the iron bound Irish coast appears. At noon they land in Queenstown.

"Come back to Erin, mavourneen, mavourneen," sings Charley's voice down the passage, early in the morning.

Charley can sing a little still. He is to lose Edith. Sir Victor Catheron is to win and wear! but as she is not Lady Catheron yet, Mr. Stuart postpones despair and suicide until she is.

She sprang from her bed with a cry of delight. Ireland! One, at least, of the lands of her dreams.

"Trixy!" she cries. "O Trixy, look out! 'The land of sweet Erin' at last!"

"I see it," Trixy, rolling sleepily out of the under birth; "and I don't think much of it. A lot of wicked looking rocks, and not a bit greener than at home. I thought the very sky was green over Ireland."

For the last two days Trixy's bitter trials had ended—her sea-sickness a dismal dream of the past. She was able in ravishing

"Oh, p-please, Sir Victor," cries Miss Stuart, in a piteous little voice, "do help me up. It's so dreadfully high, and I know I shall fall off. And oh, please do sit here, and point out the places as we go along—one enjoys places so much more when some one points them out, and you've been along here before."

What could Sir Victor do? More particularly as Lady Helena good-humoredly chimed in:

"Poor Trixy! She means well, too. Honor thy father that thy days may be long in the land. She's only trying to fulfil the command. And you think she has no chance?"

"I know it," Edith answers, with the calm serenity of conviction.

"Sir Victor, who's your friend with the solemn face and the funny knickerbockers?" whispers Trixy, under her white parasol.

"He's the Honourable Angus Hammond, second son of Lord Glengary, and captain of Scotch Grays," replies Sir Victor, and Miss Stuart opens her eyes, and looks with new-born reverence at the big, speechless young warrior, who sits sucking the head of his umbrella, and who is an honorable and the son of a lord.

The day was delightful, the scenery exquisite, his companion vivacious in the extreme, Lady Helena in her most genial mood. But Sir Victor Catheron sat very silent all the way. Rallied by Miss Stuart on his gloom, he smiled faintly, and acknowledged he felt a trifle out of sorts. As he made the confession he paused abruptly—clear and sweet rang out the girlish laugh of Edith Darrell.

"Our friends on the other side appear to be in excellent spirits at least," says Lady Helena, smiling in sympathy with that merry peal: "what a very charming girl Miss Darrell is."

Trixy shoots one swift, sidelong glance at the baronet's face, and answers demurely:

"Oh it's an understood thing that Dithy and Charley are never really happy, except when together. I don't believe Charley would have taken the trouble to come at all if Edith, at his solicitation, had not been one of the party."

"A very old affair, I suppose!" asks her ladyship, still smiling.

"A very old affair, indeed," Trix answers gayly. "Edith will make a charming sister-in-law; don't you think so, Sir Victor?"

She looks up at him artlessly, as she plunges her small dagger into a vital place. He tries to smile, and say something agreeable in return—the smile is a failure; the words a greater failure. After that, all Trixy's attention falls harmless. He sits moodly listening to the gay voices on the other side of the luggage, and finds out for sure and certain that he is dead in love with Miss Darrell.

They reach Glengariff as the twilight shadows fall—lovely Glengariff, where they are to dine and pass the night. At dinner, by some lucky chance, Edith is beside him, and Capt. Hammond falls into the clutches of Trix. And Miss Darrell turns her graceful shoulder deliberately upon Charley, and bestows her smiles, and glances, and absolute attention upon his rival.

After dinner they go for a sail by moonlight to an island, where there are the remains of a martello tower. Edith and Sir Victor, Trix and the Honorable Angus Hammond, saunter down arm in arm to the boat. Charley and the two Irish boatmen bring up the rear—Mr. Stuart smoking a consolatory cigar.

They all "pile in" together, and fill the little boat. The baronet follows up his luck, and keeps close to Edith. How beautiful she is with the soft silver light on her face.

"Am I too late?" he thought; "does she love her cousin? Is it as his sister hints, or——"

His jealous, anxious eyes never left her. She saw it all. If she had ever doubted her power over him, she did not doubt to-night. She smiled, and never once looked absorbing work. I had no idea it was after ten."

"Stay a moment, Miss Darrell," Sir Victor interposed, "there is something I would like to say to you—something I have wished to speak of, since we came on board."

Edith's heart gave one great jump into her mouth it seemed. What could such a preface as this portend, save one thing? The baronet spoke again, and Miss Darrell's heart sunk down to the very soles of her buttoned boots.

"It is concerning those old papers, the Chesholm Courier. You understand, and —and the lament'ble tragedy they chronicle."

"Yes?" said Miss Darrell, shutting her lips tight.

"It is naturally a deeply painful subject to me. Twenty-three years have passed; I was but an infant at the time, yet if it had occurred only a year ago, I think I could hardly feel it more keenly than I do—hardly suffer more, when I speak of it."

"Then why speak of it?" was the young lady's very sensible question. "I have no claim to hear it, I am sure."

"No," the young man responded, and even in the moonlight she could see his color rise, "perhaps not, and yet I wanted to speak to you of it ever since. I don't know why, it is something I can scarcely bear to think of even, and yet I feel a sort of relief in speaking of it to you. Perhaps there is 'rapport' between us—that we are affinities—who knows?"

Who indeed! Miss Darrell's heart came up from her boots, to its proper place, and stayed there.

"It was such a terrible thing," the young man went on, "such a mysterious thing. To this day it is wrapped in darkness. She was so young, so fair, so good—it seems too horrible for belief that any human being could lift his hand against so innocent a life. And yet it was done."

"A most terrible crime," Edith said; "but one has only to read the papers to learn such deeds of horror are done every day. Life is a terribly sensational story. You say it is shrouded in darkness, but the Chesholm Courier did not seem at all in the dark."

"You mean Inez Catheron. She was innocent."

"Indeed!"

"She was not guilty, except in this—she knew who was guilty, and concealed it. Of that, I have reason to be sure."

"Her brother, of course—the Juan Catheron of the papers?"

"Who is to tell? Even that is not certain. No," in answer to her look of surprise, "it is not certain. I am sure my aunt believes in his innocence."

"Then who——"

"Ah—who?" the baronet said mournfully, "who was the murderer? It may be that we will never know."

"You will know," Edith said decidedly. "I am sure of it. I am a firm believer in the truism that 'murder will out.' Sooner or later you will know."

She spoke with the calm conviction of prophecy. She looked back to shudder at her own words in the after days.

"Three-and-twenty years is a tolerable time to forget even the bitterest sorrow, but the thought of that tragedy is as bitter to my aunt to-day, as it was when it was done. She cannot bear to speak of it—I believe she cannot bear to think of it. What I know, therefore, concerning it, I have learned from others. Until I was eighteen, I knew absolutely nothing. Of my mother, of course I have no remembrance, and yet"—his eyes and tone grew dreamy—"as far back as I can recall, there is in my mind the memory of a woman, young and handsome, bending above my bed, kissing and crying over me. My mother was fair, the face I recall is dark. You will think me sentimental—you will laugh at me, perhaps," he said, smiling nervously; "you will set me down as a dreamer of dreams, and yet it is there."

Her dark, earnest eyes looked up at him, full of womanly sympathy.

"Laugh at you! Think better of me, Sir Victor. In these days it is rare enough to see men with either memory or veneration for their mother—whether dead or alive."

He looked at her; words seemed struggling to his lips. Once he half spoke. Then he checked himself suddenly. When he did speak it was with a total change of tone.

"And I am keeping you selfishly here in the cold. Take my arm, Miss Darrell; you must not stop another instant."

She obeyed at once. He led her to her cabin-door—hesitated—took her hand and held it while he spoke:

"I don't know why, as I said before, I have talked of this; I could not have done it with any one else. Let me thank you for your sympathy with all my heart."

Then he was gone; and, very grave and of the past. She was able, in ravishing toilet, to appear at the dinner-table, to pace the deck on the arm of Sir Victor. As one having the right, she calmly resumed her sway where she had left it off. Since that moonlight night of which she (Trixy) happily knew nothing, the bare civilities of life alone had passed between Miss Darrell and the baronet. Sir Victor might try, and did, but with the serene superiority of right and power Miss Stuart countermanded every move. Hers she was determined he should be, and there was all the lost time to be made up, besides. So she redoubled her attentions, aided and abetted by her pa—and how it came about the perplexed young Englishman never could tell, but somehow he was constantly at Miss Stuart's side and unable to get away. Edith saw it all and smiled to herself.

"To-day for me, to-morrow for thee," she hummed. "I have had my day; it is Trixy's turn now. She manœuvres so well it would be a pity to interfere."

Charley was her cavalier those pleasant last days; both were disposed to take the goods their gods provided, and not fret for to-morrow. It would not last—life's fairy gifts never do, for to-day they would eat, drink, and be merry together, and forget the evil to come.

They landed, spent an hour at Queenstown, then the train whirled them away "to that beautiful city called Cork." There they remained two days, visited Blarney Castle, of course, and would have kissed the Blarney Stone but for the trouble of climbing up to it. Then off, and away, to Killarney.

And still Sir Victor was Trixy's captive—still Edith and Charley maintained their alliance. Lady Helena watched her nephew and the American heiress, and her fine woman's instinct told her he was in no danger there.

"If it were the other one, now," she thought, glancing at Edith's dark, bright face; "but it is quite clear how matters stand between her and her cousin. What a handsome pair they will make."

Another of the elders—Mr. James Stuart—watched the progress of matters, through very different spectacles. It was the one dream of his life, to marry his son and daughter to British rank.

"Of wealth, sir, they have enough," said the Wall Street banker, pulling up his collar pompously. "I will leave my children a cool million apiece? Their descent is equal to the best—to the best, sir—the royal rank of Scotland is in their veins. Fortune I don't look for—blood, sir—BLOOD, I do."

Over his daughter's progress after blood, he smiled complacently. Over his son's conduct he frowned.

"Mind what you're at, young man," he said, on the day they left Cork, gruffly to Charley. "I have my eye on you. Ordinary attention to Fred Darrell's daughter don't mind, but no fooling. You understand me, sir? No fooling. By Geo—sir, if you don't marry to please me, I'll buy you off with a shilling!"

Mr. Stuart, junior, looked tranquilly up at Mr. Stuart, senior, with an expression of countenance the senior by no means understood.

"Don't lose your temper, governor," he answered calmly. "I won't marry Fred Darrell's daughter, if that's what you mean by 'fooling.' She and I settled that question two or three centuries ago."

At the village of Macroom, they quitted the comfortable railway carriage, and mounted the conveyance known in Ireland as a public car, a thing like an overgrown jaunting car, on which ten people can ride, sitting back to back, isolated by the pile of luggage between. There was but one tourist for the Lakes besides themselves, a large military looking young man, with muttonchop whiskers and an eye-glass, a knapsack and knickerbockers.

"Hammond, by Jove!" exclaimed Sir Victor. "Hammond, of the Scotch Grays. My dear fellow, delighted to see you. Captain Hammond, my friend, Mr. Stuart, of New York."

Captain Hammond put up his eye-glass and bowed. Charley lifted his hat to this large military swell.

"I say, Sir Victor," the Captain of Scotch Grays began, "who'd have thought of seeing you here, you know. They said—aw—you had gone exploring to Canada, or the United States, or some of those kind of places, you know. Who's your party?" sotto voce; "Americans, hey?"

"American friends, and my aunt, Lady Helena Bowyer."

"Now thin—look alive, yer honors," cried the car-driver, and a scramble into seats instantly began. In his own mind, Sir Victor had determined that his seat should be by Miss Darrell's side. But what is man's determination beside woman's toward Charley.

"No," he thought, with a sigh of relief; "she does not care for him in that way—let Miss Stewart think as she pleases. She likes him in a sisterly way—nothing more. I will wait until we reach England, and speak then. She, and she alone, shall be my wife."

He who marries a pretty face only is like a buyer of cheap furniture—the varnish that caught the eye will not endure the fireside blaze.

The man who is jealous and envious of his neighbors' success has foes in his heart who can bring more bitterness into his life than can any outside enemy.

More innocent amusement is in itself a good, when it interferes with no greater, especially as it may occupy the place of some other that may not be innocent.

There are qualities which govern men, such as sincerity, which have more to do with influence than the most brilliant flights of fancy and the keenest wit.

Be honest with yourself, whatever the temptation; say nothing to others that you do not think, and play no tricks with your own mind. Of all the evil spirits abroad at this hour in this world, insincerity is the most dangerous.

Qualifications of Teachers.

One of the principal discussions that took place at the Provincial Farmer's Institute in Toronto last week was with regard to the necessary qualifications of third-class school teachers. A resolution was adopted asking the Ontario government to make it compulsory for third class teachers to be qualified to teach the fifth class. At present they are not required to teach any higher than the fourth class. It was the opinion of the meeting that the standard was not high enough.

A considerable flurry has been caused in the fashionable circles of Gananoque, over a sermon preached recently by Rev. Henry Gracey, of S. Andrew's church, against the encouragement of card playing for a prize, thus giving a bad example, which might lead the young people into gambling. Progresssve euchre parties have been given two and three times a week and some very handsome prizes won by some prominent church members. Now the censure of the reverend gentleman comes down on it all.

One night recently a well-known and popular young Prescott man escorted his girl home from a whist party. The mother hearing her daughter's footsteps, went to open the door for her. Being clad only in her night robe, she was somewhat startled at seeing the young man at the door. She beat a hasty retreat behind a sofa. The couple seated themselves on the sofa and behaved much as ardent young lovers usually do when they feel sure they are alone. An hour dragged away and finally two had passed before the lovers parted. Imagine the young lady's astonishment when her mother's stately form, clad in garments white, aroose from behind the sofa.

Death of H. T. Forward.

The intelligence of the demise of H. T. Forward, which occurred at his residence, on Wednesday, 27th inst., at the age of 74 years and 24 days, will be received with regret by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. Deceased was born in Bath in 1821. He was a resident of Napanee for well on to fifty years, and at one time carried on an extensive dry goods establishment here. Twenty-five years ago he went out of business and led a retired life from that date up to the time of his death. He was a kindly gentleman and much respected for his probity of character. In politics he was a staunch reformer and did good service for the party on many an occasion. He was a member of the Church of England and a consistent christian. His wife, who survives him, has the sympatny of the whole community in her bereavement.

A Unique Reception.

Napanee was treated to a mild sensation last week. A young woman in town, who works in one of the hotels, heard that a gentleman acquaintance was circulating rumors derogatory to her character. She resolved to punish him, and to this end sent a messenger to him stating that she wished to see him. When he put in his appearance she invited him upstairs in the hotel and treated him very civilly, and at her request he took off his overcoat. She next treated him to an apple, and while he was eating it she taxed him with speaking disparagingly of her character. He denied the charge, but the girl evidently did not believe him, for she struck him over the head with the butt end of a short rawhide whip she had in her hand. She followed this up with three or four more blows, when the young man broke for the door, and went down the stairs like a top. The young man denies that he ever said anything about the woman.

A Drawn Game.

The Napaneee hockey team went up to Belleville on Wednesday to play the return match with the Quintes. So evenly were the teams that at the call of time neither side had scored, although the Napanee team had by far the best of the play. The ice was in terrible condition and quite unfit for playing hockey and it made it very hard on the forwards. The teams lined up on the rink at 8 o'clock sharp as follows:—

Quintes	Position	Napanee
J. Phillips	Goal	Jno. S. Ham
Nash	Point	H. V. Macdougal
H. Hamilton	Cover Pt.	T. E. Merrit
Phippen	Forwards	F. S. Rockwell
Twining	"	W. D. Rockwell
Powell	"	F. Carson
L. Hamilton	"	C. Trimble
S. Crouthers	Umpires	F. Mc L. Radford

Mr. F. Doyle, of Belleville, made a very impartial referee and gave general satisfaction.

The Napanee forwards played a beautiful game considering the condition of the ice and time and again assailed the Belleville goal while the Napanee defence had little or nothing to do. So far this season the defence have not had to play as they have never been forced. The boys speak very highly of the hospitality of the Quintes and there is a prospect of another match in Belleville if good ice can be secured.

To the Sunday School Workers of Lennox and Addington.

Dear fellow workers, We take this opportunity, of calling your attention to the existing necessity for enlarged prepartion for Sabbath school teaching. We must need know what to teach and how to teach. This requires that we know what and how to study. The preacher should know much more than is contained in a half-hours sermon, otherwise that sermon may savor of a very suggestive economy The teacher should know more than the lesson he is teaching. For the first half of this year we have three lessons it St. John. Will our teacher pass by that most important book without making a large, earnest effort to know the whole book? What of its author, his purpose in writing, the plans and structure of the book, where and when written, the view it gives of Christ as compared with other gospels, and its relation to christianity? These questions to some extent should be answered by every sabbath school teacher who has a holy ambition to do the best possible work for our Master. Your class may never ask these questions, but the consciousness of knowing, will make you a stronger teacher, and the knowledge you possess will help in making you a better christian. An important question is, how can you help yourself in obtaining both the matter and the method of teaching? Have you a teacher's meeting in connection with your Sunday school? One evening either at the middle or the latter part of the week should be devoted to planning how to teach the ensuing lesson. Whenever there are two or three or more who might meet for that purpose may we not ask you to do so? Begin at once. That will give you special training on the lesson course. But what about the general training which surveys a whole book and furnishes you with a method of arriving at a proper acquaintance with the whole bible? Can you not make some efforts in this direction? a little is better than none, read and study beyond your lesson. Old testament studies would be far more interesting to teach if the teacher himself bettter understood the old testament. Now a teacher's meeting shou d include senior scholars or persons who are possible teachers for the future, and are in training Such a meeting ought to be able to devote twenty minutes outside the lesson study, to the study of the books, writers, places, times and purposes of the bible and to the principles of sabbath school teaching and work. You may succeed with the same leader as in your lesson study. As a basis on which to work we suggest to you Prof. Hamill's Normal Bible and Training Lessons, a little book costing only 15 cents or thirty cents for both old and new testament, these may be had of the Rev. John McEwen, 526 church st., Toronto, or at the Methodist book room, Toronto. Towns and cities should not of necessity have a monopoly of intellectual effort. We hold that nothing is too good for the teachers of villages and country places, and no teacher should deprive himself of the privilege of making an effort. Will you try this work? Only try it for three or four weeks, and we are sure you will be surprised at the real interest awakened. Within these counties we know of but three places where such work is being attempted. We are earnestly solicitous to have it become far more general, believing it will result in increased efficiency and more systematic and successful teaching. Will as many as will attempt this week kindly drop me a card asking questions, or stating your success? Will the superintendants of Sabbath schools kindly consider quickly and try earnestly?

WE THANK YOU

For this proof of your confidence in us as advertisers. You know that when we advertise SPECIAL out of the ordinary bargains the bargains will be here. You know also that we never call shop-worn goods at a low price a bargain. To have you know this is worth good money to us. It is something to have earned your confidence as buyers, your confidence in our way of doing business, in the Goods we sell, and in what we say in the newspapers. It shall be our care to keep it, because on such a reputation we depend to make THE BIG STORE'S trade leadership enduring.

We will have Special Bargains for next Saturday

As good as the best we have ever offered.

NEW SPRING GOODS

are blocking the doors daily and going into stock as fast as they can be marked off. The new Goods for this Spring are the cheapest in the history of this country. Among arrivals this week are :

3 Cases Dress Goods per S. S. Circassia.
2 Cases Scotch Tweeds and Suitings per S. S. Circassia.
1 Case Scotch Crinkles and Zephyrs.
3 Cases New Spring Clothing, Men's Youths and Boy's Suits.
4 Cases New Spring Hats.
2 Cases Slaters Shoes for Ladies.

We have our special Hat offering, a gentleman's Fine Fur Stiff Hat in Black and Gold Brown, the very latest Spring Shape. Regular Price $2.50, our price $1.50

New Carpets, First glimpse of the New Styles for Spring. Don't you want to see them. Carpet buying is a particular business. Most people want to see what they're getting. That's right, yet you can't see the beginning and ending of everything. You can't tell how long a Carpet will wear by the way it looks when first laid, unless you are sure of what make it is. After all it's largely a matter of confidence, and the best you can do is to trade with the house in which you can put your confidence.

The Patrons will also hold a meeting in the Town Hall, Odessa, on the same evening when the same speakers will deliver addresses.

A Letter From Belgrave.

Dear Express,—As I had the pleasure of attending a golden wedding at the palatial residence of Henry Wightman, Esq., township of Wawanosh, County of Huron, on Feb. 20th, Mr and Mrs. Wightman having reached the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage, I thought a brief account of the wedding might be of interest to your readers. About seventy-seven sat down to tea. The tables were loaded with delicacies fit for a king. After tea the children and grandchildren presented them with two elegant easy chairs, a handsome eight day clock together with a number of costly books accompanied with a complimentary address. Mr. and Mrs. Wightman were so completely surprised on securing so many costly gifts that words failed them to express their thanks, when the Rev. Mr Baugh, of Manchester, came forward in behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Wightman and thanked the donors in a very flitting and feeling manner. After the congratulations we had good music both vocal and instrumental. Mr. and Mrs. Wightman have eleven children, eight sons and three daughters, all married except the two youngest, Robert and Hattie, who reside with their parents on the homestead. Three of the sons were not present as they reside at a distance—one is an orange grower in California. Their grandchildren are thirty-six in number. One gentleman was present who was at their marriage, viz., John Wightman, Esq., of Belgrave Mr. and Mrs. Wightman resided on a farm in Lennox county west of Forest Mills before coming to Huron some twenty-seven years ago and by honest industry have made the wilderness to blossom and bloom like the rose.

Yours, etc., JOHN WALKER

DISASTERS AT SEA.

A Long List of Vessels That Never Reached Port.

The sinking of the Elbe is a sorrowful addition to a long list of disasters at sea. Among the ships which have sailed out of one port and never reached their destinations were the steamships President, City of Glasgow, Pacific, Ocean Monarch and City of Boston. Not one of these ships has ever been heard from or seen since it sailed away. A hundred causes have been advanced which would account for their sudden disappearance, and a hundred things might happen which would wreck them in mid ocean. One of the saddest of these ocean mysteries, says The Chicago Tribune, was the fate of the 120 persons who sailed away from Philadelphia on December 1, 1889, on the ironclad Atlanta, rechristened Triumpho. It had been purchased by the Haytian government and its destination was Port Au Prince. It had aboard two Haytian senators, the wife of the commanding officer, a crew and over 100 young men who had been recruited in Philadelphia. It left port and passed off the face of the water, when or where has never becom known.

The City of Boston, cleared at New steerage passengers aboard and Capt. J. Haloron. At Halifax it took forty cabin and ten steerage passengers and proceeded. The only thing found which bore upon the disaster was a board, picked out of the sea February 11, 1870, upon which was scratched a message saying the ship was sinking at the time.

The British ironclad Captain, with 472 souls on board, was made a plaything of by the waves at midnight, September 20, 1870, off Cape Finisterre, and inside of three minutes it was capsized and sinking. It had heavy guns on board at the time, and its low freeboard militated against its riding out the storm without damage. There were aboard at the time its captain, Hugh Burgoyne, and Capt. Cowper Cowles, the designer of the vessel.

The steamship Ella sailed from London in the fall of 1873, and the friends of those who took passage in it waited for years for any news concerning the lost ones.

So it was with the steamer City of Glasgow. It left Liverpool March 5, 1854, and headed for Philadelphia. Four hundred and eight human beings went down with it in mid-ocean.

The steamship Pacific of the Collins line, from the same port, January 27, 1856, bound for New York, carried 186 passengers. They were not heard of again.

There was mourning in two countries—England and America—when it was finally conceded that the steampship President which had left New York for Liverpool March 11, 1841, had been wrecked and lost. There was aboard the vessel when it sailed a large number of prominent passengers, among whom was the son of the Duke of Richmond.

The steamer Hungarian, of the Montreal Ocean Steampship Co., was lost February 20, 1860, on Cape Ledge, near Halifax. There was lost 205, including all the officers.

The White Star steamer Atlantic was lost off Marshead, near Halifax, April 2, 1873. Of 900 steerage and 40 cabin passengers 546 were lost. The Atlantic was bound for New York from Liverpool.

The Ville du Havre was lost on a clear night, November 22, 1873, by running into the sailing vessel Lochean in mid-ocean. The steamer sank and 526 persons went down.

The Siberia and Barton collided April, 1874 and not a soul was saved.

The Hamburg mail steamer Schiber was wrecked in a fog on the Sicily islands May 7, 1875, and 331 people perished.

The French steamer Byzantine collided with the English steamer Rinaldo in the Dardanelles December 18, 1878 and 200 were lost.

The Ava, a British India Navigation Co. ship was sunk in the Bay of Bengal and 70 lives were lost.

The Oncle Joseph, a French steamer, collided with the Ortiaga off Stezzia November 24, 1880, and 250 were lost.

The Hamburg-American steamer Cimbria was sunk by the Sultan January 21, 1883, and 398 perished.

The steamer Geiser and Thingvalla collided off Sable Island August 14. 1888, and 106 were lost.

November 19, 1888, the W. A. Scholten, from Rotterdam for New York, ran into a collier off Dover, and 132 lives were lost.

Two years and a half ago the Naronic from New York was lost and never again heard from.

Among the most recent of naval horrors is the sinking of the English battleship Victoria off the coast of Tripoli by the Camperdown, another man-of-war.

The loss of merchant and other ships from various causes had been estimated at Lloyds in 1800 to be about an average of 365 ships a year, or one every day.

In 1830 it was shown that 677 British vessels alone were wrecked during that year. Subsequent years, particularly 1852, were disastrous to shipping, and in the following twenty-five years it was estimated that at least 60,000 wrecks occurred.

The greatest disaster of the century was that of the wreck of the British frigate St. George and Defence off the coast of Jutland in 1811. In that wreck 2,000 men were drowned.

The sinking of the Royal George off Spithead in 1782, when Admiral Kempenfeldt went down with his 600 men, was long celebrated in song and story as the great catastrophe by sea for many generations.

INTENSE COLD.

Its Effects Upon the Mental Faculties of Those Subjected to It.

Extreme cold, as is well known, exerts a benumbing influence upon the mental faculties. Almost everyone who has been exposed, for a long time or a shorter period, to a very low temperature, has noted a diminution in will power and often temporary weakening of the memory. Perhaps the largest scale upon which this action has ever been studied was during the retreat of the French from Moscow. The troops suffered extremely from hunger, fatigue and cold—from the latter perhaps most of all. A German physician who accompanied a detachment of his countrymen has left an interesting account of their trials during this retreat. From an abstract of this paper, by Dr. Rose, in The New York Medicinische Monatschrift, we find that of the earlist symptoms referable to the cold was a loss of memory. This was noted in the strong as well as those who were already suffering from the effects of the hardships to which they had been exposed. When the first appearance of a moderately low temperature (about 5 degrees above zero Fahrenheit), many of the soldiers were found to have forgotten the names of the most ordinary things about them, as well as those of the articles of food for which they were perishing. Many forgot their own names and those of their comrades. Others showed pronounced symptoms of mental disturbance, and not a few became incurably insane, the type of their insanity resembling very closely senile dementia. The cold was probably not alone responsible for these effects, for a zero temperature is rather stimulating than paralyzing in its action upon the well-fed and the healthy. These men were half-starved, poorly clad, worn out with long marching, many already weakened by dysentery and other diseases, and all mentally depressed, as an army in defeat always is. It needed, therefore, no very unusual degree of cold to produce the psychic effects observed under other circumstances only as a consequence of exposure to an extreme low temperature.

Life-Saving on the Ice.

An English gentleman has invented a life-saving apparatus for use on a lake on his onw place, which is so simple that one like it could easily be put on every sheet of water frequented by skaters. Two broad planks about eight feet long are placed on sled runners, and these are joined together by a rope fully twenty feet in length. A life-preserver is fastened to the centre of the rope, and, in case of accident, two people, by throwing themselves on the planks, could easily steer them to the hole, one on either side, when the life-preserver could be grasped by the one whose life is in danger.

WATER GAS ILLUMINANT.

Used in a Welsbach Burner After a Thorough Cleaning.

Dr. Strache's ideas as to water gas passed through sulphuric acid, to remove the volatile compound, ferric carbonid, Fe CO)4 and then employed in Welsbach lamps are being subjected to a practical trial at Gaudenzdorf, Vienna, and the results are reported as being most striking. Two streets are lit up by this means. The gas is supplied at 57 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, as against $1.50 for coal gas. The municipal report is, that 7.24 cubic feet per hour give 110 candles, and the cost of this is 0.124d. for gas, plus 0.04d. for renewals, or 0.164d. per hour in all. An ordinary street lamp consumes 4.94 cubic feet, and gives 15 candles, at an hourly cost of 0.266d. The result, then, is seven times the light at two-thirds the cost. Eight out of ten lamps have one light each and two have

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

BATH.

Local News with us is both stale and scarce, but if one drink too many had produced the same effect on men as it did on Mr. L. Aylsworth's cow there would have been a lot of dead men in Bath on court day. The cow, in taking a drink where ice was removed, slipped in and drowned.

lamps have one light each and two have three; and they are placed 33 yards apart; and print can be read at any part of the street. The ordinary gas flames look poor in comparison. The experiment is to last from the middle of October to the middle of April. The lighting is all worked by a turn of the hand, so that all the lamps shine out at once, like the electric light. At Vienna prices the incandescent lamps cost 0.384d. per hour for a 19-candle light, the arc lamp costs 7.6d. per hour for 1,200 candles; so that the water gas Welsbach costs one-twelfth of the former and one-fourth of the latter for a given amount of light. The water gas Welsbach give out only half the heat of the coal gas Welsbachs. —Gas World.

STERILIZING FOOD PRODUCTS.

Exhaustive Experiments Give a Process of Great Commercial Value.

The noted chemist and bacteriologist, Dr. Kuhn, of Paris, in an address delivered before the London meeting of the Society of Chemical Industry, gave the results of the long series of experiments which he has conducted on the rational sterilization of alimentary liquids. The use of antiseptics he rejects, since the chemical substance necessary to destroy germ life becomes dangerous when taken into the stomach. His method is to use heat for sterilization, but only sufficient to bring about the destruction of living organisms. As soon as this result is achieved rapid cooling takes place, and the liquid must not be allowed to cool gradually, as the intermediate temperatures are harmful. The heat must also be equally distributed, as overheating of any part affects the flavor and brilliancy by coagulating and precipitating the nitrogenous albuminoids. His apparatus is perfectly air tight, and silver-plated internally, which prevents the slightest metallic action. An important point of the process is the complete reabsorption by the liquid of the gases and vapors given off during the process of heating, and this is achieved by regulating the level to which the cylinders are filled. The apparatus has been tested at many of the European laboratories, with malt and other liquors intended for export; sterilization of milk, meat extracts and potable waters, and for preservation of fruits and syrups. The general opinion of those who took part in the discussion was that the apparatus was destined to yield valuable results in surgery and the industrial sciences.

Ownership of Engagement Rings.

An important decision has just been pronounced in Vermont as to engagement rings. A young man sued to recover one that he had given to a young woman, who, after accepting the ring, repudiated the engagement. The judge decided that it must be returned or else that the recipient must fulfil the conditions under which it was presented. The English courts some years ago decided that an engagement ring is not recoverable under any circumstances. —New York Telegram.

Nutmeg Poisoning.

A case of poisoning by nutmegs is reported to The London Lancet by a Scotch doctor. A woman for some reason had swallowed two nutmegs ground into a little gin. Not seeing any correspondence in your valuable paper from this place for some time I thought I would send you a few items.

We are sorry to state Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Detlor have moved to their former home at Adolphustown. Before leaving about forty young folks gathered at their place and spent a very enjoyable evening. The young ladies served tea, coffee and cake and also taffy. After enjoying themselves for a few hours they returned home, wishing Mr. and Mrs. Detlor all success in their new home. What is our loss is Adolphustown's gain.

We are pleased to state Mrs. William Fretts is slowly recovering.

DATES AND DATE-TREES.

Something About the Delicious Fruit of the Sahara Desert.

The oasis in the Oued Ris consists mainly of palm trees sheltering other trees. There are more than 600,000 palm trees and about 100,000 fruit trees. The date palm is the great nutritive product and feeding medium of the Sahara; without it the plains would be everywhere desert. Fortunately it requires for its perfect maturity and the prime quality of its fruit those very conditions that the Sahara possesses—torrid heat in summer and intense dryness of the air.

It thrives in the most arid soil, but it must have water, and plenty of it, at its roots. And it is the singularity of the Sahara, aptly called the land of thirst, that it conceals treasures of irrigation, and that it is only on those spots where the treasure may be easily obtained that the clusters of palms are found.

The delicate, transparent date, known as "meglet nous," is the choice fruit, fetching the highest price. It is at all times the rarest, changing its nature from one region to another, and being, more than any other, dependent upon the character of the soil and the climate where it grows. The remaining varieties, although numerous, may be divided into two classes: The soft dates, which are compressed between goat skins and sold in cakes in the Arab markets, and are consumed by the poorer classes, and the dry dates, of which the nomads slip a few dozen in the folds of their "bournous" for their daily consumption.

The cheaper kinds are almost entirely disposed of in the country, and are not considered worth exporting. Like other harvests, the date gathering is subject to vicissitudes and fluctuations, and prices vary accordingly.—The New York Ledger.

Champagne.

There are two peculiarities about champagne drinking which are capable of explanation. The one is the rapidity with which the wine exhilarates, notwithstanding the small proportion of alcohol it contains. This is due to the carbonic acid gas evolved, which is inhaled while drinking, for it is the property of this gas to expedite the action of anything with which it is associated. It is estimated that one glass of champagne is equal in effect to two glasses of still wine of the same strength and is more rapid in action. The other peculiarity is the sort of lethargy or deadness which follows after excessive champagne drinking. This is analogous to the stupor produced by carbonic acid gas, but it is assisted and intensified by the excess of sugar deranging the stomach. The undigested sugar turns into acid, and thus it is that too much champagne is apt to produce dyspepsia.—New York Record.

The tameness of some animals in thinly settled districts is remarkable. While a young man was fishing on an old dam in a New England stream a chipmunk ran out from the wood and boldly picked up the crumbs from his luncheon that were scattered near him. Then, curious as to what kind of animal the young man was, the chipmunk ran upon his leg as far as his knee, chattered for an instant and whisked off into the forest again.

Bloodhounds for thief-catching are used with much success and spectacular effect in several southern and western states, and sets of the animals are permanently added to the sheriff's outfit in some counties of Kentucky and Missouri. A pair of hounds in Hardin County, Kentucky, were set on the trail of a thief one afternoon recently, and after following it five miles, ran into a house, upstairs, and into a bed in which the thief, his wife and two children were asleep.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, MAR. 15, 1895.

HAYCOCK AT NAPANEE.

The large and enthusiastic crowd that packed the town hall, Napanee, on Saturday afternoon last, is a good but he assured them, as he did on that occasion, that it was purely owing to a misunderstanding for which Mr. Haycock nor himself were to blame. He was pleased to have Mr. Haycock with them for several reasons. The newspapers had taken to printing Mr. Haycock's picture. These pictures were not very flattering, and he was glad to be able to show them the original. Mr. Switzer did not intend to make a speech. He could expound to them at any time, but it was not often they had Mr. Haycock with them, so he proposed to make way and give up all the time to Mr. Haycock.

Mr. Haycock was greeted with enthusiastic applause when he came forward and his remarks were listened to with great interest. He said he knew of no place in Canada where he considered it a greater honor to address a meeting than in Lennox, the county of his birth. He was afraid that he would appear at some disadvantage. The Press had said some very kind things about him, but they had placed his abilities too high. He was afraid they would be as badly disappointed as the Scotchman in Glengarry. Mr. Haycock was addressing quite an audience of Scotchmen in Glengarry last summer. One particularly unruly Scotchman interrupted him during the course of his remarks by asking him "If he believed the statements in the newspapers that they were selling binder twine cheaper in Canada than in the United States?" Mr. Haycock replied that he did not know, as the newspapers did not always tell the truth. The Scotchman replied "That is so, for I saw your picture in the papers and it was a far better looking man than you are." Mr. Haycock hoped they would not be disappointed. He did not pose as an orator, nor was he vain of his good looks. After the next General Election he was going to have his picture re-done in coal oil.

The speaker said that old-time political stumpers generally started out by telling the farmers of their financial position. If he was an old-time Grit speaker he would endeavor to send them all home feeling as if they were tramps. If he was an old-time Tory he would try to make them go home feeling that they were all millionaires. He would not insult their intelligence by telling the farmers their financial condition. All the farmer had to do was to put his hand in his pocket and ascertain for himself whether he was rich or not. At former political meetings the doctors and the lawyers used to come along and tell the farmers that they were the bone and sinew of the country. They had not yet reduced him to skin and bone. Mr. Haycock was not there to make them feel rich or poor.

"Lives of farmers all remind us
Honest toil don't stand a chance
More we work we leave behind us
Bigger patches on our pants."

Mr. Haycock said that for the past twenty-five years there had been two parties in Canada. The Reform party, who were called the party of purity, and the Conservative party, who were called the party of deviltry. This might be changed to read, the Reformers, a party whose ways are paved with good intentions, but never get there, the Tories, a party whose actions are dark and whose ways never change.

Partyism might be explained as a system whereby honest men tie each others hands in the interest of dishonest men. Say there are 80 honest men, divided equally into two parties, and 20 dishonest men who for the largest financial inducement will vote for either side. The Government have an election fund, contributed to by the school book monopolist, the manufacturer and the government contractors. John Smith, the candidate, sends for some money and by the distribution of it among the 20 dishonest men he is elected. John Smith goes to Ottawa. some good reason for it. The two old parties said that the Patrons had stolen the best planks out of their platforms and appropriated them to themselves. If this was so, that the Patron platform embraced all the good points in that of their opponents, together with the many good planks of their own, it showed conclusively that the Patrons had the best platform. The Conservatives claim that plank seven of Patron Platform which gives to each county the power to appoint or elect all county officials paid by them was stolen from them. But as the Patrons had engrafted that plank in their platform three years brfore the Conservatives ever spoke of it, he would like to know, Who was the thief? The Liberals claim that the Tariff for Revenue plank of the Patrons was taken from them. The Liberal Party has had Unrestricted Reciprocity, Commercial Union, and several other policies, and as the Patrons had adopted the Tariff for Revenue plank two years before the meeting of the Liberal Convention at Ottawa, their claim to the ownership of it was not very well founded.

Mr. Haycock said it was not the original intention of the Patrons to send members to Parliament. They had thought that all they had to do was to get together, send in their demands to Parliament, and they would be granted. The Patrons had sent petition after petition, clothed in beautiful language, to the Parliaments of Ottawa and Toronto. The Governments took them into their serious consideration, and they have got them there yet. The Patrons perceiving that this mode of procedure was ineffectual, decided to send up a few petitions clothed in full cloth and cow hide boots.

There would have been more Patrons elected at the last elect on but for several reasons. The Patrons were an unknown quantity. It was thought that they would not stand true to their principles—that the Patron Grit would vote Grit, and the Patron Tory, Tory. The web of political bigotry was so tight they could not break loose from it. After the election it was discovered that 17 Patrons had been elected and that there had been 98,000 votes polled. Then it was said that when they went down to the House the Patron members elect would vote on old party lines. When Mr. Haycock went down to Toronto, he was forced to admit, after reading all the newspapers had said, that he was a little suspicious. He knew he was all right, but he was afraid of the other fellow. When the Patrons got to Toronto they called a meeting of the members elect, appointed Bro. Mallory president, and decided to hold a little experience meeting, to see how they intended to act. To this end they elected Bro. Mallory class-leader, and imagine Mr. Haycock's surprise when man after man got up and said that he had come down to Toronto fully determined to support the principles embodied in the Patron Platform. He then discovered that the newspapers had lied, not intentionally, perhaps, but there optics were blinded by political bigotry. After the Patron members discovered that they had all come their with the same fixed purpose, the feeling of distrust that all had experienced passed away, one of confidence took its place. And when Bro. Denyes resolution "that we pledge ourselves to vote and act unitedly on all questions declared by the majority of the Patron members to be Patron questions, and we hereby declare our determination to resist all attempts at coalition or affiliation with either of the existing political parties," no one proposed a cheer, but simultaneously every one cheered. Mr. Haycock referred to how the Patrons had all been given seats together in the House. He said both the old parties used them well at Toronto.

Referring to the division on the Government did not take action in accordance with the platform of the Patrons, they would introduce a measure into Parliament and endeavor to enforce their demands. In the matter of county officials the Patrons were in favor of having them elected by the people, still he did not think it made much difference which way they were appointed as long as we got good men by paying them a fair remuneration for their services. The Ontario Government used the power invested in them of appointing officials by rewarding partizans for past services. The speaker told of one registrar who received $1,500, who hired a man at $400 a year to look after the office, and the whole expenses of the office did not amount to over $800. This official did not go near the office once a month. The Government paid that man the extra $700 as a reward for party services. Mr. Haycock believed in the absolute independence of parliament, and to this end had refused all offers of free passes from railroads.

The Patrons would endeavor to make it a violation of the independence of Parliament for any member to accept a free pass from any transportation company. It has been made an offence against the election law for a candidate to buy a five cent glass of whiskey for a voter, and any man who held that a free pass from a railroad company did not influence a member when any legislation affecting that company came up in the House was a hypocritical Pharisee, who thanked God he was better than other men. A bill will shortly come up before parliament to grant the Kingston and Cataraqui Railway power to extend their road to Napanee, the G. T. R. want that bill burked. How can these members-holding free passes from the G. T. R. Company vote independently on that measure. Mr. McLean, the member for East York, recently introduced a bill before the House, to make a certain fixed rate per mile for railway companies to charge, no matter how long or short the distance. The other day Mr. Haycock wanted to go from Fredericksburgh to Kingston on the train, and he found the rate was $1.25, while from Kingston to Napanee, which is seven miles further, the charge was only $1.20. When he inquired the reason for this he was informed that Napanee was a competitive point, as a stage ran between Kingston and Napanee. Now, what reason have members of Parliament with free passes in their pockets to care what the general public pay, or whether there are competitive points or not.

A man in the audience here asked Mr. Haycock the question, if it was so that the Ontario Government had supplied the Patrons with a committee room and a private secretary? Mr. Haycock said the statement was both correct and incorrect. When the Patrons went down to Toronto they found that the Reformers and Conservatives had committee rooms. The Patrons thought if the lawyers and doctors were entitled to a committee room, surely the farmers, who paid the lion's share of erecting the Parliament Buildings, were too, and they applied to the Government for a room and got it. In reference to the private secretary, a member of the Government had offered him the services of Mr. Phillips Thompson, to hunt up any information that Mr. Haycock might require, write letters for him, etc. Mr. Haycock asked: "Is this gentlemen in the employ of the Government now?" "Yes."

"If I avail myself of his services will his salary be increased?" "No."

"Will it interfere with the discharge of his other duties, or necessitate the employ of any one else to perform his present duties?" "No."

On these conditions Mr. Haycock accepted the gentleman's services.

The speaker dealt at some length with the question of the abolition of on Saturday afternoon last is a good augury of the success of E. B. Switzer in the on-coming election, and evinces the deep interest the electorate in this district take in his candidature. Never have we attended a more unanimous or orderly meeting, and the frequent applause that greeted the many good points scored by Mr. J. L. Haycock showed that those present were fully in accord with the speaker and recognized the force and truth of what he was propounding.

A number of ladies graced the occasion with their presence and occupied positions of honor on the platform.

The townhall was totally inadequate to accommodate the large crowd, and many were forced to turn away. The meeting was called to order about 2 p. m. by the appointment of Mr. Charles Files as chairman. Mr. Files filled this responsible post of honor very creditably and acceptably, and in a brief and well-worded address explained the objects of the meeting, and extended an invitation to Mr. Wilson, or any representative in his behalf, to come forward, when a reasonable time would be granted him to present his side of the political question. Mr Wilson failing to respond, the chairman called upon E. B. Switzer, the Patron candidate in Lennox for the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. Switzer, on rising to address the audience, was greeted with loud cheers. He said the circumstances at present were more pleasant than on the other afternoon when he addressed an audience here. He was pleased to see so many ladies present. It was a proper place for ladies, and if they were present oftener on occasions of this kind there would be better conduct at political meetings. They had been disappointed on the former occasion in not having Mr. Haycock with them. When he gets there he is told that if it hadn't been for the $20,000 sent down to him he wouldn't have been elected. And then he is told that it was not for love of him, nor yet for the miserable devils that took it, that the money was sent down. Oh, no. The manufacturer wants his money back in the shape of a little more protection, the contractor wants another fat job, and so it goes on. Look at the Connolly-Larkin fund, a firm who got a half million dollars by dishonest contracts. Here is an example of how justice is meted out in Canada. Connolly and Larkin stole twenty thousand dollars from the country. A short while ago two young men broke into a store in Kingston and stole a clean shirt. They were caught and given three years in gaol. What did Connolly and Larkin get? One year in gaol without hard labor. After a three months sojourn the atmosphere of the gaol was found to be injurious to their health, and the Government let them out. No wonder the atmosphere of the gaol was bad with those two rascals in it. It's a wonder their breath did not pollute and poision the other inmates to death. Can you endorse this kind of justice in Canada? Where is the remedy to come from? The 20 dishonest men who take the bribe, or the 80 honest men who furnish the Government with the power to give it? The remedy is to be found by the honest men of both parties joining with the Patrons. The Patrons of Industry had formulated a platform so wide that the honest men of both the old parties could unite upon it and make out of this Dominion the grand country that the Creator intended it should be. There was something in the Patrons of Industry after all. You can't bring a party into such prominence in such a short time without budget, Mr. Haycock explained that a motion was moved to go into Committee of Supply, and any amendment to that motion was a want of confidence motion in the Government. The opposition had moved in amendment that we do not go into Committee of Supply but "That the Speaker do not now leave the chair, and that it be resolved that in the opinion of the House the present mode of paying registrars of deeds and other county officials is unsatisfactory; that said officials should be paid by salary, such salaries to be commensurate with the duties performed, and the surplus fees, if any, should be funded for the benefit of the municipalities." It was simply a catch question, and the Patrons were not going to be made a catspaw of to suit the ends of any party. The Government had appointed a commission to enquire into the fee question, and the Patrons had promised to wait till that commission presented its report to the House. The Patrons voted against the amendment, and as men of integrity they could not have acted otherwise. Had they adopted any other course they would have branded themselves as liars. And what object would have been gained. Had they voted for the amendment the Government would still have had a majority of seven over all. But had the result been different, and the support of the Patrons to the amendment would have brought about the defeat of the Government, what would have been gained by that action? A general dissolution and appeal to the people at the cost of thousands of dollars to the country. In this matter the Patrons had voted in the interests of the farmers. The Patrons had promised to wait till the commission on the fee question took down their report, and then if the the maintenance of Government House. The Lieut-Governor received $10,000 for duties that were almost purely a grey headed old man, tottering and infirm, who held out his hand and said, "pease give me something for I am hungry." The thought struck Mr. Haycock that if the money wasted in keeping up the grand show at the Government House was expended towards keeping up charitable institutions, or distributed among the poor and hungry it would be more christian and divine, and alleviate a lot of suffering. It was argued that our Lieut-Governor did not cost us much, as his salary was paid by the Dominion Government. It would be much cheaper for Ontario if she paid the salary of her Lieut-Governor. There were eight Lieut-Governors in Canada, and as Ontario was the largest and richest province she had to pay the lion's share of the salaries of those officials. The speaker said that when Mr. Switzer went to Ottawa he would support a resolution to abolish the maintenance of Rideau Hall. We had too much government in Canada. Compare New York state, with her six millions of population with Canada when not hardly five millions. Our governors alone cost $250,000 a year, while New York State had only one governor whom they paid but $10,000 a year. We were either a mighty hard people to govern or else we were over governed. There is too much machinery in connection with the government of Canada, and remember that every bit of it is oiled with farmers' sweat.

Mr. Haycock here turned his attention to the system of superannuating civil servants. This system was not applied to the producers, and why should it be applied to the parasites. These men who have been superannuated would not have remained in the employ of the government one hour if they could have bettered their condition anywhere else. They were paid a good salary, and should have saved enough out of it to keep them when they had retired from the public service without paying them out of the public revenue $260,000. The speaker who has no Senate, had a surplus of four millions of dollars; Quebec with a Senate had a deficit of $40,000. Some said that we could not abolish the Senate, as it was part of the Constitution, and if we did attempt to abolish it the House of Lords, who it would finally come before, would veto the attempt to do so. The speaker thought it they didn't hurry up there wouldn't be any House of Lords left to veto it. Mr. Haycock said that if we must have a Senate for heaven's sake let it be an elective one. Senators, at present, were not appointed for any peculiar fitness for the position. It was simply a hospital in which the government put condemned politicians. They were an irresponsible body, as there was no limit to their occupancy of the position. They stay there till nature removes them. Some of the senators have got so deaf that they supposed to leave off your clothes and wear diamonds. Clothes are a luxury, diamonds are a necessity. Speaking of oil reminded him that there was one oil that the government had put on the free list. He heard of it and during harvest time last summer: he wanted some oil for his mowing machine, and as this oil was on the freelist he thought it must be cheap. So he took his can and went into Wade's drug store in Kingston, and asked the clerk for half a gallon of oil of Attar of Roses. All the astonished clerk could ejaculate was one great big "what?" He said that as Attar of Roses was on the free list he thought it would be cheap. The clerk informed him it was four cents a drop. Mr. Haycock didn't take any of it. In the face of these facts the speaker said they have the audacity to tell us that they tax the luxuries and not the necessaries. Isn't it a farce. The idea of taxing our clothing and letting wool come in free. He did not know why they let the class of wool referred to above in free, unless it was to have enough to pull over the farmers eyes. Now let us consider how they have protected the home market for the farmers. The government have put a 20 per cent. duty on barley to keep the Americans from sending their barley into Canada, (loud laughter), they have put a duty on Canadian cheese, also to keep this fellow out.

Mr. Haycock said if he was a believer in protection there was one way the government could have assisted and protected the farmers if they were desirous of doing so. There was one million and forty seven thousand beef hides imported into Canada from Australia free of duty last year. A duty of two per cent. would have helped the farmers of Canada. Just the moment those hides passed into the hands of the tanner to be manufactured into leather there was 15 per cent duty chucked on to it. When the farmer owned it, it was raw material, with the tanner it was the finished product, and passed into the hands of the boot and shoe makers, harness makers, and an additional 25 to 30 per cent. duty clapped on to it. Your representative, the gentleman who assisted to bring this about, Whose in-

INDUSTRIAL NOTES

The leather trade is called fairly prosperous. Leather is always in demand.

In railroad building, 1894 has been the slackest year since the war, only 1,761 miles of new track having been laid.

The Russian Government has sanctioned a telegraph line from St Petersburg to the Murman coast at an expenditure of about 500,000 rubles.

An electric road is now proposed from the field of Gettysburg all the way to Baltimore.

A rise in the price of beef is threatened. In Kansas City a new schedule has come into effect with local butchers necessitating an average advance of two and a half cents a pound to customers.

According to official figures, 41,391,199 tons of anthracite coal were marketed in 1891, though probably from 5,000,000 to 7,000,000 tons more were mined. This is less than the 33,059,533 tons in 1893, or the 41,852,369 tons of 1892, but exceeds the output of any year previous to 1892.

A number of Western water powers transmit electric power from fifteen to thirty miles.

In sixteen months the great drainage canal of the City of Mexico will be opened. The canal is over thirty miles long, and the tunnel through the mountain six miles. The total cost will have been $20,000,000, and they have been looking with the thing off and on for public revenue $260,000. The speaker gave a list of civil servants showing how the system had been abused, and that men who were in good health were superannuated with a good allowance to make room for some needy partizan. He cited the case of John Dawson, Wolfe Island, who had been superannuated on account of old age and infirmity, and Wm. Horn, a man several years older than Dawson, appointed in his stead. Horn was dead and another man had his place, while Dawson, who had been superannuated on account of old age and infirmity, was acting as license inspector and working his farm. One case cited is worthy of special mention. When Edward Blake, who on account of his great ability, was paid $15,000 a year by the C. P. R. company as their solicitor, severed his connection with the company and went to the old country, the company substituted, on account of his great ability, Judge Clarke, of Colborne, paying him $15,000. The government superannuated judge Clarke with a yearly allowance of $1600 on account of his old age and infirmities. At the end of each year Judge Clarke holds out his right hand, and on account of his great ability draws $15,000 from the C. P. R. Co'y, and then he holds out his aged and infirm left hand, and draws $1600 from the government on account of his inability to perform the services. Mr. Haycock asked, "Has your representative presented your views when he never raised his voice on the floor of the House against this system?" You want to get rid of machine politics. Send men to parliament who will represent your views, ideas and interests. The farmers are the only class of men whose representatives do not represent their views. Foster and Tupper represent the views of the fishermen of New Brunswick, and arrange the tariff in their interests. The fishermen wanted free salt and material for their nets and they got it. The farmers want free salt for their cattle and their porridge. Did your representative raise his voice to get it for you? No; there is a duty of 15 per cent. on it, and 20 per cent. on the sack. Your representative has not worked in your interest and you will tell him so with no uncertain sound when you get an opportunity. Mines were opened up and the owners wanted to import machinery to work them and they were immediately placed on the free list. The farmers wanted agricultural implements but your representative did not get them put on the free list. He did not blame Mr. Wilson. He went to parliament under contract and simply lived up to that contract. They did not want to send men to parliament who were under contract. In Mr. Switzer they had a man who had integrity and ability, and the farmers would do him and themselves honor in sending him there.

Referring to the abolition of the Dominion Senate Mr. Haycock said he did not wish to say much on this subject. The Senate was as useless as the fifth wheel to the coach. That it was a drawback to the country could be shown by a comparison. Ontario, nature removes them. Some of the senators have got so deaf that they can't hear the speaker on the opposite side of the chamber, and some so blind that they cannot see him. One poor old fellow has got so infirm and decrepit that he is unable to go to the hotel, so a bed has been rigged up for him in the House, and every morning when the Senate meets the door of his room is opened and he hollers out from his bed, "here!" For performing those services he gets a $1000 a year. If you are satisfied with this, stick to your old parties and you'll have it.

Mr. Haycock said that tariff for revenue only, and so adjusted as to fall, as far as possible, upon the luxuries and not upon the necessaries of life, is the eighth plank in the Patron platform. The Reformers go in for this, too. The Conservatives go in for protection. The Conservatives claim that the N. P. tariff is so framed that it falls more lightly on the necessaries of life, and heavier on the luxuries. At any rate all are agreed that it is the proper thing to lay the duties on luxuries, and not on the necessaries.

Next to air and water, the speaker thought, light was the most essential thing. The government taxed coal oil 100 per cent. We used sixteen million gallons of coal oil per year in Canada. Of this we import six million gallons from America, on which we pay a duty of 100 per cent. This money paid in duty goes into the revenue of the country all right. There is ten million gallons of coal oil manufactured in Canada. The heavy duty on the oil allows the few men engaged in the business to put down in their pockets six million dollars annually. Who count? The few or the many. There is eleven refineries in Canada employing 250 men. Take the duty off coal oil, pay those men the money invested in the business, give the 250 men employed $1.25 a day to sit on the fence, and after doing all this, you will still have $400,000 left in your pocket on the investment. The wealthy man burns gas and electricity: coal oil is the light of the poor man, and on this the duty is 100 per cent. Electric light free, coal oil taxed 100 per cent.

In the face of this it is absurd to claim that the government taxes the luxuries and not the necessities.

Then there was clothing. They must wear clothes. The law compelled them to do so. What action had the government taken regarding it. The government claim that they grant protection to the farmer in the home market. Let us see. There is a duty on certain classes of wool, and certain classes come in free. Strange to say of the class of wool on which there is a duty there was imported into into Canada 1028 pounds, while of that class admitted in free there was imported three million pounds. The farmer has to compete in the market of the world against all comers, but just as soon as his wool goes to the weaver has the farmer the privilege of buying in the markets of the world. No: he finds that when he goes to buy his clothing there is a duty of from 40 to 50 per cent. upon it. And then we look around and find that diamonds are on the free list. You farmers are representative, the gentleman who assisted to bring this about. Whose interest was he working in when he helped to frame a tariff of that description. Was he working in the interest of the farmers or for his individual interests? If the farmers are wise they will send men to Ottawa whose interests are identical with their own.

Mr. Haycock dealt with the trading feature of the Patrons, and was glad to say that it had been almost done away with. He said the storekeepers had nothing to fear from them. They should both unite together, as they were each fighting combines. He showed how the Patrons had been successful in breaking the salt combine. Referring to the oft repeated assertion that the farmers could not get along without lawyers in parliament. He said that there were eleven lawyers in the Cabinet of seventeen members at Ottawa, and notwithstanding this fact they had paid $140,000 for legal advice. This was a lot of money, and if Mr. Haycock had it he would want a mighty lot of legal advice to induce him to part with it. In reply to the question that the farmers were well off, he said that no one knows better than the one who wears it where the shoe pinches the most, and no one knows better than the farmer his own condition. A Spanish proverb says "that a fool knows better how to run his own house than a wise man knows how to run his neighbors." The farmer's knew what they wanted and they had set out to get it. There was a large number of honest men who were with the Patrons although they did not belong to them. The Patrons intended to go on in such ornamental, and as the duties were light he thought the Lieut.-Governor ought to be able to board himself and keep his own house. Mr. Haycock said that he had received an invitation to attend one of the Lieut-Governor's parties. He could not accept it consistently, so he did not go. On the evening of the party he and a friend walked down passed the residence of the Lieut-Governor. It is a beautiful building, and it has cost the ratepayers of Ontario over a quarter of a million dollars to maintain it since confederation. It was beautifully illuminated as they passed it, and sweet sounds issued from it, for they had a brass band in attendance. He and his friend had just turned the corner on this gay scene when they met a manner as to win the confidence of their friends, and compel their enemies to respect them. There were certain men whom they never expected would be with the Patrons. Men who inherited their politics. Men who were Grits and Tories because their fathers were. They were in a rut, worn for them by their fathers, down to the very hub, and it would wrench every spoke out of the political hub for them to get out of it. There was also the great army of partizans, whose politics had become chronic to them, they had become petrified. They were wrapped up in their shell of political bigotry, from which it was impossible for them to disunite themselves. But independent of these there was the great army of men who would not let the decayed and mouldering dust of their ancestors brains do the thinking for them.

The meeting broke up with three cheers for Switzer and Haycock.

It's Astonishing

that noitwthstanding the 20 days of Big Selling since we opened the Hinch & Co. Bankrupt Stock, you can hardly see the difference in the shelves. Don't imagine for a moment that the bargains are all gone—there are more and bigger bargains to be given all next week.

We have marked down a lot of Furs at prices to save every buyer 50 per cent. on their money.

We will clear $7 large Grey Robes for $5.00.

We will sell an $8 better quality for $5.50.

We will sell an $8.50 Superior Robe for $6.00.

Some fine Black Robes, Wombat Robes and White Goat Robes to be sacrificed.

We will clear a nice Black Lamb Coat for $9, $17 Seal Caps for $12, $16 Seal Caps for $11, $15 Seal Caps for $10, Grey Caps as low as $1.00

We will sell Fur Lined Capes from $5.00. Fur Lined Circulars from $8.00.

We have only 13 Astracan Mantles left, but some of the best are still here. They have been going fast, and some of them to purchasers from long distances. We want to clear these 13 out in one week. "That's our stint." Now "Pater familias" this is your chance to redeem that promise to your wife made so long ago. You can save $10 to $15 by buying that Fur Mantle now instead of six months hence. Can you make money faster? Won't it pay you to borrow the money if you havn't got it? Think of it! we will give you a splendid $35 Mantle for $25, and a $45 one for $30. Other prices between at correspondingly large savings.

Equal inducements for saving will be given on Men's Overcoats. We have brought them all up from the basement and placed them on a table near the eastern window. See for yourself the red ink prices, which are lower than the makers prices. One line we clear at $3.00 each, which were cheap at $5.00.

We will sell a lot of Wool Goods as Hoods Caps, etc., for 10c each, regular price 60c, 90c, to $1.25.

We will clear a lot of Print Shirts, only 3 doz of them left, at 25c. each, regular $1 and $1.25 goods, all complete with 2 and 3 Collars.

We will clear a lot of 75c Cream Silk Handkerchiefs for 35c. Also a lot of Lawn and Linen sample Handkerchiefs at about half regular value.

Every way you look, at every turn you take around this great store you are confronted with Bargains that can't be duplicated after these are sold.

We secured a lot of Bargains last week, such as Prints, worth 12½c, which we are selling at 7½c, others as low as 4 cents. Shirting at 4c., Ginghams at 4½c.

We don't want to forget to mention those Cloth Mantles which have made a sensation in this district at 75c, $1.00 and $2.00, worth from $6 to $20. Piles have been sold—there are a number left Also a lot of the longer latest cut and style to be sacrificed along with the Mantle Cloths, all of which we want to clear BEFORE SATURDAY 23rd, to make room for our GRAND MILLINERY DISPLAY, as our opening is on that day. Our New Milliners, Miss Sherrin and Miss Patterson, are busy preparing delectation for you in the way of pretty, stylish Hats and Bonnets which will serve as a guide to you for this spring season's styles. Many of these are direct from Europe, and we have arranged for later arrivals of Millinery Materials, Hats, etc., which will be the latest emanations from the best Parisian and London modistes. These Goods, along with many other lines, we get by direct importation from European manufactuers, thus saving the wholesalers profit. Our Mr. Mowat's close associations with the Europeans producers, his familiarity with the best markets which he visits always twice every year, will keep us in constant touch with the Styles, best sources of production, and therefore the places, from which the best values and the most desirable Goods can be obtained We claim advantages possessed by no other house outside the largest cities, so that our old patrons and friends may rest assured Cheapside will more than maintain her old position at the head of the Dry Goods, Millinery, Housefurnishing and Fur business of the Central District. We have formed a Strong Syndicate to carry on this business with greater push, enterprise and zest than ever. Our Mr. Ogden Hinch and our S. P. Hinch will be on hand to welcome their friends and see that all the old patrons of the House get all the courtesy, attention and service that can be given. We herewith extend to you our grateful acknowledgements for your hearty patronage during the past 17 years, and also for the more than liberal patronage given since Cheapside reopened.

CHAPTER VI.

And after to-night we will all have a rest, thank Heaven! and my pilgrimage will come to an end. A fortnight at Powyss Place before you go up to London, my dear Miss Stuart—not a day less."

Thus Lady Helena Powyss, eight days later, seated luxuriously in the first-class carriage, and flying along by express train between Dublin and Kingston, en route for Cheshire.

Captain Hammond was of the party still, and included in the invitation to Powyss Place. He sat between Lady Helena and Sir Victor now—Miss Stewart, in charming travelling costume, in the sunny seat near the window. On the opposite seat, at the extreme end, sat Edith Darrell, her eyes rivited upon the pages of a book.

Since that night in the boat Miss Stuart had quietly but resolutely taken entire possession of Sir Victor.

Before she left her room on the ensuing morning following that never-to-be-forgotten night, Edith had entered and taken Trix in her arms and kissed her.

"I was stupid and out of sorts last night, Trixy," she had said. "If I seemed churlish, I ask your pardon, dear, with all my heart. I was surprised—I don't mind owning that—and perhaps a little, just a little, envious. But all that is over now, and I do wish you joy and happiness from the bottom of my heart."

And she meant it. Against the baronet himself, she felt anger deep and strong still. How dared he seek her out as he had done, select her for his confidante, and look love in fifty different ways, when he meant to marry Trix? What a fool she might have made of herself had she been a whit less proud than she was. Since then she had avoided him: in no marked manner, perhaps, but she had avoided him. If he felt this avoidance, he showed no sign. Perhaps he thought Miss Stuart had dropped some hint—girls, despite their promises, have been known to do such things—and this change was becoming maidenly reserve. Trixy's unremitting attentions were sisterly, of course. He felt grateful accordingly, and strove to repay her in kind. One other thing he observed, too, and with great complacency—the friendship between Miss Darrell and her cousin Charley had come to an end. This was as it should be; certainly Beatrix must have dropped that very judicious hint.

Two carriages awaited them at the Chester station. Into one entered Mr. and Mrs. Stuart, Sir Victor, and Beatrix; into the other, Lady Helena, Edith, Charley, and Captain Hammond. They drove away through quiet, quaint Chester, "rare old city of Chester." Presently an endless stretch of ivied wall appears in view, inclosing a primeval forest, it seems to Edith; and Lady Helena sits up and rubs her eyes, and says it is Catheron Royals.

They emerge from the chill darkness of dawning day into a blaze of light—into a vast and stately entrance-hall. A long file of servants are drawn up to receive them. And "Welcome to Powyss Place," Lady Helena says with kind courtesy. "I can only wish your visit may be as pleasant to you as you made mine in New York."

Without changing their dresses they are ushered into a lofty and handsome dining-room. More brilliant lights, more silent, respectful servants, a round table luxuriously spread. They sit down; forget they are tired and sleepy; eat, drink, and are merry; and it is five before they were shown up to their rooms. Then, hasty disrobing, hasty lying down, and all are at peace in the land of dreams.

Next day, about noon, Miss Stuart, clicking along in her narrow-soled, high-heeled boots, over a polished oaken corridor, lost her footing, as might be imagined, and came down, with an unearthly screech, on one ankle. Sir Victor was first on the field, and in Sir Victor's arms Miss Stuart was lifted, and borne back to her room. Luckily it was near, or even Sir Victor's chivalry and muscular development would not have been equal to it, for Trix was a "fine woman." The ankle was bathed and bandaged, the invalid's breakfast brought up—everything done for her comfort that it was possible to do; and in the midst of their fussing, having cried a great deal, Miss Stuart suddenly dropped off to sleep. Edith came out of the room looking pale and tired. In the slippery passage she encountered Sir Victor waiting.

"I have waylaid you on purpose, Miss Darrell," he said, smiling, "lest you should meet with a mishap, too. A carpet shall be placed here immediately. You look pale—are you ill?"

"I feel well enough; nothing is ever the matter with me; but I am rather stupid. Stupidity," she said, with a little laugh, "is my normal condition."

"You will come with me for a walk, will you not?" he asked. "The park is very well worth seeing. To-morrow, Miss Stuart's sprain permitting, we shall all visit Catherine Royals. Do come, Miss Darrell; it will do you a world of good."

She hesitated a moment, then went. What difference did it make? Trix wouldn't be jealous now. What difference did anything make, for that matter? So they went on that fateful walk, that walk that was to be like no other in all Edith Darrell's life.

"This is the Lime Walk—the prettiest at Powyss Place, to my mind." This was the young baronet's first commonplace remark. "If you will ascend the eminence yonder, Miss Darrell, I think I can point out Catheron Royals; that is, if you think it worth the trouble."

It was all the same to Edith—the Lime Walk, the eminence, or any other part of the park. She took Sir Victor's arm, as he seemed to expect it, and went with him slowly up the elevation.

"It is a wonderfully pretty place," she said. "I should think you English people, whose ancestors, time out of mind, have lived and died here, would grow to love every ivy-clad stone, every brave old tree. If I were not an American girl, I would be an English miss."

She laughed and looked up at him, her spirits rising in the sunshine and the free, fresh air. His eyes were fixed upon her face—passionate admiration, passionate love, written in them far too plainly for any girl on earth not to read. And yet—he had proposed to Trix.

"You would?" he eagerly exclaimed. "Miss Darrell, do I understand you to say you could live in England all your life—give up America and your friends, and pass your life here?"

She shrugged her shoulders.

"It would be no great sacrifice. Apart from my father there isn't a soul in all wide America I care a farthing for, and your English homes are very charming."

The last barrier broke down. He had not meant to speak—he had meant to be very prudent and formal—to tell Lady Helena first, to refer the matter to Mr. Stuart next. Now all prudence and formality were swept away. Her hands were in his—he was speaking with his whole heart in every word.

"Then stay and share an English home—share mine Edith, I love you—I have loved you, I think, since I saw you first. Will you be my wife?"

Alas for Trix!—that was Edith's first thought. To burst out laughing—that was Edith's first impulse. Not in triumph or exultation—just at this moment she felt neither—but at the awful blunder Trix had made; for Trix had made a blunder, that was clear as day, else Sir Victor Catheron had never said those words.

"I meant to have spoken to Lady Helena and Mr. Stuart first," Sir Victor went on; "but that is all over now. I can't wait longer; I must take my sentence from your lips. I love you! What more can I say? You are the first my lips have ever said it to—the first my heart has ever felt it for. Edith, tell me, may I hope?"

She stood silent. They were on the summit of the hill. Away, far off, she could see the waving trees and tall chimneys of a stately mansion—Catheron Royals, no doubt. It looked a very grand and noble place; it might be her home for life—she who, in one sense, was homeless. A baronet stood beside her, offering her rank and wealth—she, penniless, pedigreeless Edith Darrell! All the dreams of life were being realised, and in this hour she felt neither triumph nor elation. She stood and listened, the sunlight on her gravely beautiful face, with vague wonder at herself for her apathy.

"Edith!" he cried out, "don't tell me I am too late—that some one has been before me and won your heart. I couldn't bear it! Your cousin assured me that when I spoke the answer would be favorable. I spoke to her that night in Killarney—I did not mention your name, but she understood me immediately. I told her I meant to speak as soon as we reached England. I asked her if she thought there was hope for me, and she——"

The passionate eagerness, the passionate love and fear within him checked his words suddenly. He stopped for a moment and turned away.

"O Trixy! Trixy!" was Edith's thought and ridiculous and out of place as the emotion was, her only desire still was an almost uncontrollable desire to laugh outright. What a horrible—what an unheard-of blunder the child had made!

She stood tracing figures on the with the point of her parasol, feeling strangely apathetic still. If her life had depended on it, she could hardly have accepted Sir Victor then. By and by she might feel half wild with exultation—not now.

He waited for the answer that did not come. Then he turned from her, pale with despair.

"I see how it is," he said, trying, not quite successfully, to steady his voice; "I am too late. You love your cousin, and are engaged to him. I feared it all along."

The brown starry eyes, lifted slowly from the grass and looked at him.

"My cousin? You mistake, Sir Victor; I am engaged to no one. I"—she set her lips suddenly and looked away at the trees and the turrents of Catheron Royals, shining in the brilliant sun—"I love no one."

"No one, Edith! Not even me?"

"Not even you, Sir Victor. How could I? Why should I? I never dreamed of this."

"Never dreamed of this!" he repeated, in amaze; "when you must have seen—must have known——"

She interrupted him, a faint smile curling her lips.

"I thought it was Trixy," she said.

"Miss Stuart! Then she has told you nothing of that night at Killarney—I really imagined she had. Miss Stuart has been my kind friend, my one confident and sympathizer. No sister could be kinder in her encouragement and comfort than she."

"O poor Trix—a sister!" Edith thought, and in spite of every effort, the laugh she strove so hard to suppress dimpled the corners of her mouth. "Won't there be a scene when you hear all this!"

"For pity's sake, Edith, speak to me!" the young man exclaimed. "I love you—my life will be miserable without you. If you are free, why may I not hope? See! I don't even ask you to love me now. I will wait; I will be patient. My love is so great that it will win yours in return. O darling! say you will be my wife."

Her hands were in his. The fervor, the passion within him almost frightened her.

"Sir Victor, I—I hardly know what to say. I wonder that you care for me. I wonder you want to marry me. I am not your equal; I have neither rank, nor wealth, nor descent.

"You have the grace and beauty of a goddess—the goodness of an angel; I ask nothing more. You are the mate of a prince; and I love you. Everything is said in that."

"Lady Helena will never consent."

"Lady Helena will consent to anything that will make me happy. The whole happiness or misery of my life lies in your hands. Don't say no, Edith—don't for Heaven's sake. I could not bear it—I cannot lose you; I will not!" he cried almost fiercely.

She smiled faintly again, and that lovely rose-pink blush of hers deepened in her cheeks. It was very nice indeed to be wooed in this fiery fashion.

"Fortes fortuna juvat," she said, laughing. "I learned enough Latin, you see, to know that fortune assists the brave. People who won't take 'no' for an answer must have 'yes' of course."

"And it is 'yes'! Edith—"

"Be quiet, Sir Victor, it is not 'yes' just yet, neither is it 'no.' You must let me think this over, my head is giddy with your vehemence. Give me—let me see—until to-morrow. I can't answer now."

"But, Edith—"

"That much is due to me," she interposed, proudly; "remember, I have not expected this. You have surprised me this morning more than I can say. I am proud and grateful for your preference and the honor you have done me, but—I am honest with you—I don't love you."

"But you love no one else. Tell me that again, Edith!"

She grew pale suddenly. Again she looked away from him over the sunlit slopes before her.

"I am a very selfish and heartless sort of girl, I am afraid," she answered. "I don't know that it is in me to love any one as I ought—certainly not as you love me. If you take me you shall take me at my true value. I am not an angel—ah, no; the farthest in the world from it—the most selfish of the selfish. I like you very much; it is not hard to do that. To be your wife would be my highest honor, but still I must have time. Come to me to-morrow, Sir Victor, any time, and you shall have your answer. Don't say one word more until then. Now let us go back."

He bowed and offered his arm. She took it, and in profound silence they walked back. The one topic that filled him, heart and soul, strength and mind, was forbidden—it was simply impossible for him to speak of any other. For Edith she walked calmly beside him—her mind a serene blank.

They reached Powyss Place—they entered the drawingroom. All eyes turned upon the newcomers, Trix's with suspicious jealousy. If Sir Victor were in love with herself, was not his fitting place by her side in this trying hour, instead of meandering about with Dithy? And what business had Dithy monopolizing another girl's lover?

"I think I shall ride over to Drexel Court between this and dinner," Sir Victor said. "I promised Hampton——"

Lady Helena laughed and interrupted:

"And Lady Gwendoline is there—I understand. Go by all means, Victor, and give Gwendoline my love. We shall expect you back to dinner."

The young man colored like a girl. He glanced uneasily at Edith, but Miss Darrell had taken up a photograph book of literary celebrities, and was immersed therein.

Captain Hammond and Charley betook themselves to the billiard room. Trixy turned her suspicious eyes upon her cousin.

"Where were you and Sir Victor all day, Edith?"

"I and Sir Victor have not been any where all day, Beatrix. During the last hour we have been walking in the grounds."

"What were you talking about?"

"Many things," Miss Darrell responded, promptly. "The beauty of the prospect—the comfort of English homes, and the weather, of course. If I understood shorthand, and had been aware of your anxiety on the subject, I might have taken notes of our conversation for your benefit."

"Did you talk of me?"

"I believe your name was mentioned."

"Dith!" in a whisper, and raising herself on her elbow, "did Sir Victor say anything about—about—you know what?"

"He did not say one word about being in love with you or marrying you, if that is what you mean. Now please stop catechising, and let me look at the pictures."

Twilight fell—dinner hour came: with it Sir Victor. He looked pale, anxious, tired. He answered all his aunt's inquiries about the Drexel family in the briefest possible manner. His over-fond aunt looked at him a little uneasily—he was so unlike himself, and presently drew him aside, after dinner, and spoke.

"Victor, what is the matter? Are you ill?"

"Ill? No. My dear aunt," smiling, "don't wear that alarmed face—there is nothing the matter with me."

"There is something the matter with you. You are pale, you are silent, you eat nothing. Victor, what is it?"

"I will tell you to-morrow," he answered. "Spare me until then. I am anxious, I admit, but not even to you can I tell why to-night. You shall know all about it to-morrow."

For Edith—she was in that mood of serene recklessness still. Of to-morrow she neither cared to think, nor tried to think. The tide of her life was at its flood; whither the stream might bear her after this night, just now, she neither knew nor cared. For the present she was free, to-morrow she might be a bondwoman. Her fetters would be of gold and roses; none the less though would they be fetters.

Upon going to her room that night Edith Darrell did not go to bed. She put the lights away on the toilet table in the dressing-room. She breakfast hour was ten. It doesn't take me all that time to dress."

"Where did you go then?"

"I walked in the grounds."

"Edith!" with sudden sharpness, "did you see Sir Victor?"

"Yes, I saw Sir Victor."

"Where? In the grounds, too?"

"In the grounds, too—smoking a cigar."

"Edith!" the sharpness changing to suspicion and alarm. "You were with Sir Victor!"

"I was with Sir Victor. That is to say, Sir Victor was with me."

"Bother! Did he ask after me?"

"Ye-e-es," Edith answered, doubtfully, "he asked for you, of course."

"Was that all? He's a pretty attentive host, I don't think." cried Trixy, with bitterness.

"My dearest Trix," said Edith, struggling with a laugh, "gentlemen don't call upon young ladies in their chambers at break of day, even though they have a sprained ankle. It isn't de rigeur."

"De rigger be blowed! It isn't my chamber; it's my private parlor. Edith, upon your word, did he say anything about—about—you know what?"

"Marrying you? No, Trixy, not a word."

She put her arms closer around poor Trixy's neck, and hid her face in Trixy's chestnut hair.

"Trix, pet, don't you think there may have been a little—just a little, misunderstanding that night at Killarney?"

"Misunderstanding! I don't understand you, Edith," Miss Stuart exclaimed, in increasing alarm. "For goodness sake come round where I can see you, and don't stand there like a 'Get thee behind me, Satan.' I like to look people in the face when I talk to them."

"In one moment, dear; please don't be cross. I am afraid to tell you, Trix, there was a misunderstanding that night."

"I don't see how; I don't believe there was. Edith Darrell, what do you mean?"

"There was a misunderstanding, I repeat. He means to speak to your father and mother to-day, but—not about you."

"Edith?" Trix half sprung up, pale as death and with flashing eyes, "What do you mean? Speak out, I tell you!"

"O Trix. There has been a horrid mistake. All the time in that boat on Killarney lake he was talking of—me!"

"Of—you!" The two words drop from Trixy's ashen lips.

"Of me, dear, and he thinks at this moment that you understood him so. Trixy—don't be angry with me—how could I help it—he proposed to me yesterday afternoon."

"Proposed to you yesterday afternoon!" Trix repeats the words like one who has been stunned by a blow, in a dazed sort of tone. "And you—refused him, Edith?"

"Accepted him, Trixy. I said yes to Sir Victor Catheron this morning in the grounds!"

Then there was a pause, Beatrix Stuart sat white to the lips, with anger, mortification, amaze, disappointment. Then she covered her face with her hands, and burst into a vehement floods of tears.

"Trix, dear Trix!" Edith exclaimed, shocked and pained; "good Heaven, don't cry! Trix, dearest, I never knew you were in love with him."

"In love with him!" cried Trix, looking up, her eyes flashing through her tears, "the odious little wishy-washy, drawling coxcomb! No, I'm not in love with him—not likely—but what business had he to go talking like that, and humming, and hawing, and hinting, and—oh!" cried Trix, with a sort of vicious screech, "I should like to tear his eyes out!"

"I dare say you would—the desire is both natural and proper," answered Edith, smothering a second desire to laugh; "but, under the circumstances, not admissable. It was a stupid proceeding, no doubt, his speaking to you at all, but you see the poor fellow thinks you understood him, and meant it for the best."

"Thought I understood him!" retorted Miss Stuart, with a vengeful glare. "Oh, shouldn't I like to make him understand me! The way he went on that night, kissing my hand, and calling me Beatrix, and talking of speaking to pa, and meaning you all the time, is enough—enough to drive a person stark, staring mad. All Englishmen are fools—and Sir Victor Catheron's the biggest fool of the lot!"

"What, Trix! for wanting to marry me?"

"Yes, for wanting to marry you. You, who don't care a bad cent for him!"

"How many bad cents did you care, Miss Stuart, when you were so willing to be his wife?"

"More than you, Miss Darrell, for at least I was not in love with any one else."

"And who may Miss Darrell be in love with, pray?"

"With Charley," answered Trix, her face still afire. "Hush, it if you dare! In love

THE AUTUMN OF LOVE.

There had been a time when the rector of Orlestone had ambitions, but that was before the woman he loved had married a rich man and passed out of his life.

Now he lived a retired life, but he liked to visit Celia Ringwood and talk over the past. Celia was thirty-eight, she had always loved him, and yet she had often tried to comfort him for his bitter loss. This was heroic, indeed. One day the rector came to see Celia. He was excited.

"You have always been a true friend to me," he said, nervously. "I've always told you everything."

"Yes," she said, and her heart knew his errand even before he spoke.

"Celia, her husband is dead and she has taken the Hall at Orlestone."

Celia Ringwood held out her hand to him. The light went out suddenly in her face, but it left the kindly mouth and eyes as she had always seen them, and one who had loved her would have noticed the change.

"Only last night," he said, "it seemed to me there was nothing left in life, but duty and the blessed faith in the life to come. But now—oh, Celia!—I feel young again."

"Shall you ask her again to marry you?" There was a harsh note in her voice, which she herself noted with dismay. But he did not perceive it.

"Yes, of course," he said, simply.

Miss Ringwood bit her lip.

"You are very poor," she said, "and Lady Mountdew is very rich. People will say—she might think——"

"You don't know Eva Mountdew," he said, proudly.

Celia was ashamed of her words before he had answered them.

She left his thin hand a moment between her soft palms and looked at him wistfully.

"Whatever happens," she said, "I know you will not forget old friends." Her voice trembled a little as she said it.

"Dear Celia," he answered—and some faint subconscious stirring of remorse made his voice very gentle and tender—"Dear Celia, I am very selfish. You have been too patient with me; you have spoiled me."

She laughed a little and took her hands away.

"An old maid must have something to spoil," he said. "If it had not been you it would have been a cat or a canary bird. When shall you see her?"

"This afternoon. She asked me to come up to tea. She has let the Ashford people furnish a few rooms and she is camping out, as she calls it, till the rest of her furniture comes from London."

There was a pause. Then he got up suddenly, and began to walk up and down the narrow space betwen the door and the window, with knitted brows and hands clasped behind him.

"Well?" said Miss Ringwood.

"It isn't that I doubt her constancy," he said, "but I don't know whether it's fair. I'm old, you see, and I have grown dull. It is rather like offering her the dry husks of—of—"

"Of what she threw away fifteen years ago."

"You are unjust," he said.

"No, no; I didn't mean it, James. Now you must go. I am very busy; and be sure you come in and tell me about it. Good-bye; you need not be afraid because your hair is gray. If she loved you—well, good-bye."

He went off down the street with a new hopefulness in his step. When he was gone Miss Ringwood went up to her room; she leaned her elbows on the little white dressing table, among the prim wool mats and the little daily text books, and looked again at her self in the glass. Her eyes were very sad, though no tears stood in them. Presently a smile stirred the corners of her mouth, where a dimple still lingered.

"After all," she said to herself, "she is fifteen years older, too."

For four days Miss Ringwood looked hourly for the rector. He had brought his sorows to her always; surely he would bring his joy, too. Next morning there was a letter. It was not from him; she saw that while yet it was in the postman's hands, for she had been watching at the window, and had to run to the door when she saw the postman cross the road. It was from his housekeeper.

"Please forgive the liberty," it said, "but master is very ill, and he keeps asking for you. He has had a bad cough for some time, but he would not send for the doctor. He says you can cure him. Please come at once."

He did not know what he thought it was—some one else, she said to herself, but not bitterly.

"You are ill, and you never sent for me. And you never came as you promised," she said, with only the gentlest reproach.

"I could not," he spoke, hoarsely, and then a fit of coughing took him and he sank back in his chair.

"But you are ill," she said. "I must send for a doctor at once."

"But he could do me no good. What nonsense it is!" he went on, irritably. "Who told you I was ill? I'm all right, only very tired."

"I've brought you some beef tea and things."

His brows contracted. "Now, Celia, I will not have it. There is nothing the matter with me." The grieved look in her eyes stopped him.

"You always trusted me before."

"I did—I do—I will! Celia, I went to see her. It is all over. I have wasted all my life on a shadow."

"She never did care, I think. She did not even know me at first. She only wanted to see the parson about her pew, and sent for him as she sends for anything, for the sake of a woman who know me at first, and—when she did.

"I have thrown away life, and youth, and hope, and love, everything, everything else she wants! She did not never was at all, except in my dreams and my fancy. And there is nothing left in life."

"Poor James," she said. She had taken off her prim bonnet and seated herself near him. "But all our poor people; you still have them to live for."

"That's what I keep saying to myself, but all the sunshine is gone and it looks such a long way to the end."

"But it is better to know the truth," she said, rather lamely.

"I don't know; I didn't realize before and that is why I couldn't come to you. Oh, Celia, you don't know—I didn't know till just now—all that you've been to me all these years, and but for my own folly and madness you might have been with me, close at my side all these long, long years, for you did love me once, didn't you, Celia?"

She was silent.

"At least," he went on, hesitatingly "if you had been my wife you would have learned to love me."

"Learned to love you! Oh, my dear!"

Her tone thrilled him to the soul. Her head was down on the arm of his chair, and his hand very gently and uncertainly touched her smooth, faded hair.

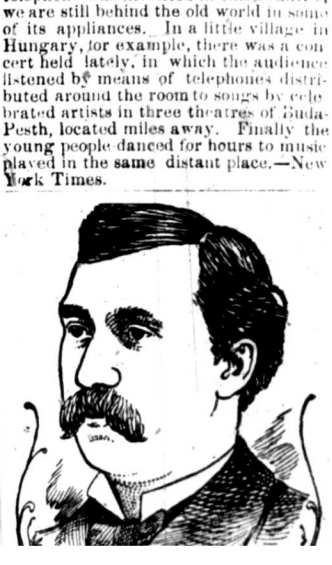
"You didn't mean—why, Celia, my dear, my dear!"

For her arms were around his neck, and her face against his, and for that one good minute the long lonely years of sorrow seemed not too heavy a price.

"And now," said Miss Ringwood, lifting from his shoulder a face that had grown young and pretty again, "and now perhaps you will take the beef tea."—Quiver.

Dancing to Distant Music.

Notwithstanding the fact that the telephone was invented in this country, we are still behind the old world in some of its appliances. In a little village in Hungary, for example, there was a concert held lately, in which the audience listened by means of telephones distributed around the room to songs by celebrated artists in three theatres of Buda-Pesth, located miles away. Finally the young people danced for hours to music played in the same distant place.—New York Times.



ing-room, wrapped something around her and sat down by the window to think it out.

Should she marry Sir Victor Catheron, or should she not?

She cared nothing for him—nothing whatever—very likely she never would. She loved Charlie Stuart with all the power of her heart, and just at present it seemed to her she always must. That was how the problem stood.

If she married Sir Victor, rank and wealth beyond all her dreams would be hers, a life of luxury, all the joys and delights great wealth can bring. She liked pleasure, luxury, beauty, rank. For love—well, Sir Victor loved her, and for a woman it is always better, safer, to be loved than to love.

That was one phase of the case. Here was the other: She might go to Charley and say, "Look here—I care for you so much, that life without you, isn't worth the living. I will marry you, Charley, whenever you like." He would make her his wife. Alone in darkness, her heart thrilled as she thought of it—and the intenest joy of life would be hers for a while. For a while. They would be poor—his father would cast him off—he must, for the first time in his life, begin to work—the old story of pinching and poverty, of darning and mending, would commence over again for her, poor food, poor clothes, all the untold ugliness and misery of penury. Love is a very good and pleasant thing, but not when bought at the price of all the glory and pleasure of the world.

She turned from the life she pictured with a shudder of abhorrence. She should say "Yes" to-morrow to Sir Victor Catheron.

Then for a moment the thread of thought broke, and she sat looking blankly out at the soft spring night. On the day she pledged herself to Sir Victor she must say good-by forever to Charley—so it began again. One house must not contain them both; her word, her plight must be kept bright and untarnished. Charley must go.

She rose, feeling cold and cramped, she undressed with stiffened fingers, and went to bed.

She slept, deeply, dreamlessly. The sunlight was pouring into her room, flooding it with golden radiance, when she awoke.

She sprang up; her heart gave one bound of recollection and rapture. Sir Victor had asked her to be his wife.

Doubt was at an end—hesitation was at an end.

She sang as she dressed. Not the May sunshine itself was brighter than her face. She left her room, she walked down the corridor, down the stairs, and out upon the emerald green lawn.

A well-known figure, in a gray suit, stood a few yards off, pacing restlessly about and smoking. He flung away his cigar and hurried up to her. One glance at her smiling face was enough, his own flushed deep with rapture.

"I have come for my answer," he cried. "O Edith, my darling, don't let it be 'No.'"

She laughed aloud at his vehemence—it was the sort of wooing she liked.

"I should like to please you, Sir Victor—what, then, shall it be?"

"A thousand times, yes! Edith, my love, my love—yes!"

She was smiling still—she looked him frankly in the eyes as no woman on earth, in such an hour, ever looked at the man she loved. She laid in his one slim, brown, ringless hand.

"Since you wish it so much, Sir Victor, let it be as you please. Yes!"

CHAPTER VII.

It was half-past twelve, by all the clocks and watches of Powys Place. Miss Stuart sat alone, in the pleasant boudoir or sitting-room, assigned her, her foot on an ottoman, a novel in her hand, a frown on her brow, and most beautifully dressed. In solitary state, at half-past ten, she had breakfasted, waited upon by the trimmest of English handmaidens in smiles and lace cap. The breakfast had been removed for over an hour, and still Miss Stuart sat alone.

The door opened and Edith came in. At all times and in all array, Miss Darrell must of necessity look handsome.

"Good morning, Trixy," she said. "How is our poor dear ankle? It doesn't hurt much, I hope?"

She came up behind Miss Stuart's chair, put her arms around her neck, stooped down and kissed her forehead.

"It does hurt," Trixy responded, crossly. "I wish I had never had an ankle, sooner than go spraining it this way. Edith, how long is it since you got up?"

"Now for it!" thought Edith, and the smile she strove to repress, dimpled her sunny face.

"How long? Oh, since half-past eight. You know I'm not a very early riser."

"Where have you been?"

"Out for a walk."

"Alone?"

"Yes."

"Where?"

"Oh, Trixy, what a catechism! Through the fields, and down by the river, and all over the place. I wanted to think."

"Think what?"

"Think what I should do."

"Do about what?"

"About Sir Victor Catheron."

"Sir Victor Catheron! Why, what on earth has he to do with you?"

"Nothing, as yet. He has asked me to be his wife, and I have promised to be Lady Catheron."

Miss Stuart sat bolt upright, and stared at her companion in speechless amazement.

"Edith Darrell, are you mad?" she cried, at last.

"Not that I am aware of. Why?"

"Why? Because you must be mad to say such a thing. Sir Victor Catheron, indeed! Why, he is old enough to be your father."

"Not quite. He is forty-two, I believe."

"Forty-two! Why, he is a confirmed invalid. He is a hopeless cripple. He is—"

"Very rich, very generous, very kind, very much in love with me, and very much to be pitied. Don't forget that, Trixy."

"I shall forget nothing of the kind. I shall remember that you are a heartless coquette, and that you have thrown away your own happiness and his. Edith, you don't love him!"

"Don't I? Perhaps not. I am not sure. I like him very much, and I am very sorry for him. I am sure I shall be a good wife to him, and do my best to make him happy. I am sure I shall be very fond of him. Isn't that enough?"

"Enough! Oh, you heartless girl! Enough to make him happy, indeed! Enough to make yourself happy! Edith, you are throwing away your own happiness, and you are breaking my heart. You know you are. You know I love you, and you know I love Charley, and he with you."

"Are we going to quarrel, Trix? Is it worth while—we who have been like sisters so long?"

"Like sisters!" Trix repeated bitterly. "Edith, I wonder if you are not scheming and deceitful!"

"Beatrix!"

"Oh, you needn't 'Beatrix' me! I mean it. I believe there has been double dealing in this. He paid attention to me before you ever came to New York. I believe if I hadn't been sea-sick he would have proposed to me on the ship. But I was sea-sick,—it's always my luck to be every thing that's miserable,—and you were with him night and day."

"Night and day! Good gracious, Trixy, this is awful!"

"You know what I mean," pursued Trix loftily. "You got him in love with you. Then, all the way to Killarney you flirted with Charley—poor Charley—and made him jealous, and jealousy finished him. You're a very clever girl, Edith, and I wish you a great deal of joy."

"Thank you; you say it as if you did. I don't take the trouble to deny your charges; they're not worth it—they are false, and you know them to be so. I never sought out Sir Victor Catheron, either in New York, on board ship, or elsewhere. If he had been a prince, instead of a baronet, I would not have done it. I have borne a great deal, but even you may go too far, Trixy. Sir Victor has done me the honor of falling in love with me—for he does love me and he has asked me to be his wife. And now I will leave you; if I stay longer we may quarrel, and I—I don't want to quarrel with you, Trixy."

Her voice broke suddenly. She turned to the door, and all the smallness of her own conduct dawned upon Trix. Her generous heart—it was generous in spite of all this—smote her with remorse.

"Oh, come back, Edith!" she said; "don't go. I won't quarrel with you. I'm a wretch. It's dreadfully mean and contemptible of me, to make such a howling about a man that does not care a straw for me. When I told you, you wished me joy. Just come back and give me time to catch my breath, and I'll wish you joy too. But it's so sudden, so unexpected. O Dithy, I thought you liked Charley all this while!"

"I like him, certainly; I would be very ungrateful if I did not. He is like a brother to me."

"A brother! Oh, bother," retorted Trix, with immeasurable scorn and dignity. "Edith, honor bright! Haven't you and Charley been in love with each other these two years?"

Edith laughed.

"A very leading question, and a very absurd one. I don't think it is in either your brother or me to be very deeply in love. He would find it feverish and fatiguing—you know how he objects to fatigue; and I—well, if love be anything like what one reads of in books, an all-absorbing, all-consuming passion that won't let people eat or sleep, I have never felt it, and I don't want to."

"But you like him," persisted his sister, "don't you, Dithy?"

"Like him—like him!" Her whole face lit up for a second with a light that made it lovely. "Well, yes, Trix, I don't mind owning that much—I do like Charley—like him so well that I won't marry and ruin him. For it means just that, Trixy—ruin. Charley and I have common sense, and we have shaken hands and agreed to be good friends and cousins, nothing more."

"What an admirable thing is common sense! Does Sir Victor know about the hand-shaking and the cousinly agreement?"

"Don't be sarcastic, Beatrix. I have nothing to confess to Sir Victor when I am married to him; neither your brother nor any other man will hold the place in my heart (such as it is) that he will. Be very sure of that."

She moved to the door, her dark eyes shining, her head erect, looking in her beauty and her pride a mate for a king.

"There is to be a driving party to Eastlake Abbey, after luncheon," she said, "you are to be carried down to the barouche and ride with your father and mother, and Lady Helena—Charley and Captain Hammond for your cavaliers."

"And you?"

"Sir Victor drives me."

"Alone, of course?" Trixy says, with a last little bitter sneer.

"Alone, of course," Edith answers coldly. Then she opens the door and disappears.

The Bath.

Here are some facts in regard to baths. A daily bath is necessary to health and beauty. A hot tub bath should be taken only before bedtime. Salt baths are soothing and cleansing.

after decent bending of address, date and "Honored Madam"—but master is very bad, and he says 'No doctors.' He has been ailing these three days. If you was to think fit to come over you might persuade him for his good. Yours obedient to command, Emma Wellings."

"I'm going out," she cried to her little maid, "at once."

The shortest way to the rectory lay through the fields, and Miss Ringwood took it. She hurried on through the keen, sweet air, devoured by a burning anxiety that consumed all self-consciousness, all personal doubts and dreams. When she saw the blue smoke curling from the red chimneys of the rectory above the laurels and cypresses she quickened her pace, stumbling a little now and then on the rough pathway.

The housekeeper opened the door.

Celia clenched her hands as she went in. He did not hear her open the door. He was sitting gazing into the fire, with his head on his hand and his elbow on his study table. His head was bowed, and Celia realized for the first time that he was no longer young. He looked bowed, an old man.

She laid her hand on his arm, and he started and looked at her with a look of sudden joy and tenderness she had never hoped to see. But it faded as

No Strength. No Ambition

Hood's Sarsaparilla Gave Perfect Health.

The following letter is from a well-known merchant tailor of St. George, N. B.:

"C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.:

"Gentlemen—I am glad to say that Hood's Sarsaparilla and Hood's Pills have done me a great deal of good. I had a severe attack of the grip in the winter, and after getting over the fever I did not seem to gather strength, and had no ambition. Hood's Sarsaparilla proved to be just what I needed. The results were very satisfactory, and I recommend this medicine to all who are afflicted with rheumatism or other

Don't Put It Off.

The necessity of a spring medicine is universally admitted. This is the best time of year in which to purify the blood, to restore the lost appetite, and to build up the entire system, as the body is now peculiarly susceptible to benefit from medicine The great popularity attained by Hood's Sarsaparilla, owing to its real merit and its remarkable success, has established it as the very best medicine to take in the spring. It cures scrofula, salt rheum, and all humors, biliousness, dyspepsia, headache, kidney and liver complaints, catarrh, and all affections caused or promoted by low state of the system or impure blood. Don't put it off, but take Hood's Sarsaparilla now. It will do you good.

Cheese Meetings.

The annual meetings of the Union, Napanee and Excelsior cheese factories were all held during the present week. They were all well attended by their patrons and everything passed off very pleasantly. Mr. Bartlett was unanimously voted the price he asked for manufacturing, 1¼ per pound of cheese, which is the ruling price throughout this locality. In addition to owning these three cheese factories Mr. Bartlett has the manufacturing of Centreville and Croydon factories and it is his intention to have the five factories of a uniform fine quality, and if sold together they are sure to sell above the general run of factories which their patrons will receive the benefit of, and, consequently, may expect a better dividend than from most other factories.

Napanee factory, which is situated in the centre of the group, is thoroughly equipped as a butter factory as well as a cheese factory and late on in the fall, or when the cheese season closes, all the milk will be brought to this factory and manufactured into butter, and as the Government has agreed to guarantee 20c. per lb. for this butter farmers should provide themselves with suitable fodder so as to be able to milk their cows well on through the winter and give themselvees remunerative employment during that season.

This strange freak is possessed of a voracious appetite, and drinks milk like an ordinary calf, but never seems to be satisfied. It has hoofs like a calf, but its body is longer and its legs shorter than the common variety. It has never been heard to bleat like a calf or bark like a dog. Its forelegs are somewhat shorter than the hind ones and the hooves on the front legs turn out like the paws of a bull dog. It appears to be quite healthy and playful and when it plays it stands up on its hind legs and frisks round like a young pup.

Local Union.

The Y. P. S C. E. of the E. M. and W. M. churches have formed a local union to meet once in every three months, with Mr. D. Ovens as president, Mr. F. Hooper as secretary and a managing committee of three from each society. The union has been carefully organized and promises to do good work. The object of this new organization is mainly to give the christian endeavorers of Napanee an opportunity to meet in a mass meeting and discuss new and better methods of work and be stirred up to a greater degree of enthusiasm in the great christian endeavor movement. Perhaps one of the most commendable reasons for the establishing of this union is, that by the bringing of these young people from different churches together a greater spirit of friendship will prevail among them. On the young people of today the future of the church must depend, and the christian endeavorers have taken this step, so that if they can bring it about, there shall be in the future a greater measure of unity among all churches or organizations working for the common cause—the conversion of the unsaved and upbuilding of true christian character. The first meeting of the local union will be held in the lecture hall of the W. M. church on Thursday evening, March 21st. A very excellent programme, along endeavor lines, has been prepared and a large gathering of those interested in the work is expected to be present to hear it. St Enip.

The N. H. C's. First Defeat.

Thursday of last week the Hockey Club went back to Belleville to play off the draw of the week before with the Quintes, and were beaten to the tune of 4 games to 0. The Quinte team was strengthened by the addition of two of the best forwards of the Y. M. C. A. team which made them practically a picked team, but the boys gave them a pretty fast whirl nevertheless and with more satisfactory decisions from the goal umpire might have won the game. The teams lined up at about 8 30 as follows:

Quintes	Position	Napanee
W. Nash	Goal	J. S. Ham
H. Powell	Point	H. V. Macdougall
J. Phippen	Cover Pt.	T. E. Merritt
L. Hamilton	Forwards	F. S. Rockwell
H. Twining		W. D. Rockwell
R. Weller		C. Trimble
Kelso		W. Carson
F. McKeown	Umpire	F. McL Radford

F. Doyle, Referee

There were about 300 spectators witnessing the match. The game opened with a rush, both sides playing at a pace that could not last long. After about fifteen minutes play the Quintes scored, and about five minutes latter scored again No more goals were taken till the end of the first half, leaving the score at half-time Quintes 2 Napanee 0. Shortly after play commenced again Rockwell by a splendid play carried the puck the whole length of the rink and scored a goal. But the Belleville umpire did not see it, although everybody else did, and it was not counted. A few minutes later Rockwell did the same trick again, and again the umpire claimed he did not see it. This time it was so glaring that the Belleville referee, who by the way gave the greatest satisfaction, gave the umpire a warning. These decisions disheartened the boys, who felt that it was impossible to win against decisions like that. They did not play nearly the game they know how to play and the result was the Quintes made two more goals, leaving the score 4 to 0. This leaves the Napanee club even with the Quintes, with a win and a draw each. Napanee was to have played Picton this week but owing to the uncertainty of the weather the match was cancelled.

In reply to your kind favor of recent date I have to say in regard to Rev. Mr. Scott's condition, he remains in about the same condition as when coming to the hospital. If any difference his delusion seems to have a wider range and become more fixed.

In my opinion Mr. Scott will never recover from this malady and the probability is that he will always have to remain in an institution of this kind, or be cared for at home under the directions and care of a special nurse. If this could be done it would not be necessary for him to be confined here, as he is perfectly harmless and easy to manage.

I appreciate what you say regarding Mr. Scott's ability and past usefulness, as also the anxiety of his numerous friends as to his recovery, and I regret greatly not being able to give you encouragement as to his ever getting well.

Mr. Scott has every care and is made as comfortable as possible under the existing circumstances.

With very kind regards I am.

Yours Respectfully,
Dr. O. W. Archibald.

Dehorning Cattle.

Mr. L. F. Moore informs us that he had the pleasure of accompanying Dr. Meng one day last week, on a dehorning expedition in the country back of Napanee. For a man of the doctors well known temperance principles he can handle more horns than any man we have yet heard of, and he considerably surprised his genial friend Moore with the dexterity in which he handled a horn, or to be explicit 124 horns was the number amputated by the Doctor on the day Mr. Moore accompanied him. Baron Shibley's, near Wilton, was the first place visited and in a short space of time 22 bovines were metamorphosed into "cant hooks." Mr. Babcock, of Wilton had twenty five cattle dehorned, the Messrs Lake, of Murvale, 22, Mr. Denyes, Violet, 18 head, Mr. Storms, of Florida, 10 head, Mr. Storms, of Wilton, 9 head, while 18 other cows were reduced to muleys.

lines of Bicycles. Important improvements have been made in this year's models. Wood rims are now exclusively used, as they have been found much less liable to split than was at first thought, and they have a great advantage over steel rims on account of freedom from buckling. Ladies wheels will be much lighter in weight, varying from 22 to 27 lbs., an average of 15 lbs. lighter than last season's makes. McAlister & Co. will have all the different grades in ladies, Misses and boys wheels as well as mens this season. The celebrated Columbias will be better than ever this season as the Pope Co. have secured the right to use the patent nickel steel tubing, which enables them to turn out a much lighter weight and give at the same time as great strength as a frame made of the best steel tubing. Their heaviest road wheel for this season weighs only 21¼ lbs. and is fully guaranteed to carry a person up to 230 lbs. weight. The "Comet" is a new addition to the lines handled by McAlister & Co. and is by all odds the best wheel made in Canada. They also have the Whitworth, the best English wheel, and the Stearns, Fleet, Spartan, Falcon, Crescent and other lines which makes an assortment from which any taste can be satisfied. Satisfactory terms can be arranged for payment. Call and see them before buying.

ter from Rev. Arthur Jarvis advocating the establishment of a County Poor House in Napanee. While I fully sympathize with the spirit of benevolence and philanthropy actuating those who are moving for the erection of a Poor House, I cannot at the same time agree that it would be advisable for this county to engage in such an undertaking. In the first place we must remember that there are four distinct grades of paupers in this country:

1st. The professional aristocratic
2nd. The notorious tramp.
3rd. The immoral characters.
4th. The moral character.

For the benefit of your subscribers I will give a short sketch of each.

One day as I was engaged in school in Gloucester, England, one of the boys came to me and said, please Sir, there is a gentleman at the door wishing to speak to you. Of course I went, and sure enough there was a gentleman, no less than a "navy officer" splendid navy blue coat, gold facings, a cap with gold band to match, white kid gloves, and spicy umbrella Of course he knew my name and offered a very polite apology for the intrusion, at the same time taking from his breast a sheet of parchment, not quite the size of the map of England which he handed me to read. I said, I must beg you to excuse me, for I am engaged with one of my classes, and have not time; and putting my hand into my pocket, I put one cent into his delicate white kid gloved hand. He made me a very graceful bow, of course, he supposed I had given him a shilling, for, as soon as the door was closed, I heard the rattle of that half-penny on the flags, and such an explosion of profane language, that would have astonished a Billingsgate fish wife. From his manner, his language, his delib erate articulation I could see that he had received a superior intellectual education.

A few years since, one of the same class came to Napanee, in the garb of a clergyman. He was an intellectual swindler, and by deceit, and hypocrisy he took with him as much money, as would have supported an honest man, many a week

No. 2 is the wandering tramp, selfish, lazy, idle, and dissipated.

No. 3 is the local immoral, slothful, indolent loafer.

No. 4 is the infirm, deserving, unfortunate moral character, and these are few in number, in comparison with other classes.

When I was at Manchester, England, there were boys 16 years of age in the Workhouse who could describe the dietary of every Poor House within twenty miles of the city.

To manage the pauper classes in England successfully is the most difficult problem that the "Poor Law Board" have to contend with to day. If we had a Poor House in Napanee, no matter how large, I will guarantee it would be filled in a very short time with No's. 2 and 3. So that our county council should use great discresion before they act. T. MCLEOD.

MORE MINERS BURIED.

Seven Men Entombed in Boston Run Colliery.

AN EXTENSIVE CAVE-IN.

A Band of Rescurrs Dig for Their Lost Comrades and Find Them Unhurt, But Can not Reach Them.

A Shenandoah despatch says: This community was startled this afternoon when it was announced that a great fall of coal had buried seven miners in the Boston Run Colliery. The fate of the thirteen entombed men at Plymouth added a new terror to the accident. Men and women and children rushed to the mine and at once a large force of rescuers set to work to dig out their lost comrades. The victims of the cave-in are:

Joseph Meckes, John Mecker, Lewis White, Charles Mohen, Elwood Mingle, James Kramer and William Ervine.

It was 3 o'clock when the catastrophe occurred. Heroically, almost breathlessly, the rescuers toiled for two hours. Then they were partially repaid and greatly encouraged by finding the Meckes brothers unhurt.

With renewed vigor the band of miners set to work to save their other companions. An hour went by and no signs of the lost miners. Women and children crowded at the head of the shaft to hear of the progress made in the black pit below.

The falling mass brought with it a rush of water, and also dammed up the water in the lower gangway so that the Meckes brothers, who were working in the lower gangway, had to swim through six feet of water to a free part of the gangway that enabled them to finally get out of the mine.

The officials decided that, by cutting through adjoining pillars for a distance of forty or fifty feet, they could reach the imprisoned men, and this work was at once begun with a full force of employees.

For hours the rescuers hammered away at the barrier that lay between them and their comrades. At last they heard noises from the vicinity of where the missing men were supposed to be, and the joyful news was soon passed about that the men were safe, and, to all appearances, jolly and hopeful in their impromptu tomb. If the fall of to-day does not extend and become general, the officials expect to release the imprisoned men before morning, but if another fall shall occur their destruction is inevitable.

SPRING WRAPS.

The Umbrella Back No Longer Favored in Paris.

Here are some Paris notes on wraps, all from Le Bon Ton for March:

The three-quarter length coat will in all probability still reign supreme, at least during the early spring. Parisian cloakmakers have, however, decreed the abolishment of the umbrella back, which had a short but successful reign. The latest dress coats do not materially differ from those in the winter, the sleeves and revers remaining almost the same; the necessary fulness at the back is attained by double pleats, which expand it sufficiently to fit gracefully over the skirt.

EVENING CLOAKS AND CAPES.

Evening cloaks are merely long circulars of red, pink, tan or blue cloth; the prettiest are bordered with raveled silk and lined with the richest silk in stripes or brocade.

A handsome type of evening cape is of white Amazone cloth, reaching half way to the knees; it had two ruffle collars and was edged with ruffles of white ribbon and narrow gold soutache, put on in a design of undulating lines.

TRAVELLING WRAPS.

For travelling there are useful capes of loosely woven Scotch goods in checks and subdued plaids in brown and tan. These capes are cut after the model of those worn by cavalry officers; a monk's cord lined with a bright color is sometimes added.

For middle-aged women there are mantles of black satin or silk, with slate ren s reaching below the knees, with fitted shoulders, and finished by three ruffles edged with narrow lace and jet; it is tied in at the waist.

Capes of light-colored lady's cloth have cut-work borders underlaid with coarse black net, a new and very effective trimming; others have an edging of narrow embroidery.

The high-shouldered butterfly effect is somewhat on the wane, the garments being as a rule less full than they have been.

THE NEW BRITISH PREMIER.

Sketch of the Public Career of the New Liberal Leader

CHOSEN TO SUCCEED GLADSTONE.

Sir Henry Ponsonby, the Queen's Private Secretary, visited Lord Rosebery in London yesterday afternoon, and told him of the Queen's wish that he accept the Premiership. Lord Rosebery was unwilling to give any immediate decision. He conferred at length with his colleagues in the Cabinet, and delayed his acceptance until the evening. The Queen will come from Windsor to London to-morrow, and will give Lord Rosebery an audience in Buckingham Palace. Sir William Vernon Harcourt, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Earl Spencer, First Lord of the Admiralty, and Mr. Herbert Asquith, Home Secretary, called upon Lord Rosebery to-day. Mr. Gladstone attended the Chapel Royal, St. James, this morning and took no part in the Cabinet-making.

Sir Archibald Philip Primrose, Knight of the Garter and Privy Councillor, is Earl Rosebery in the peerage of Scotland and Baron Rosebery in the peerage of the United Kingdom. The Primrose family acquired distinction in the beginning of the seventeenth century through James Primrose, a lawyer of note, who became Clerk of the Privy Council of Scotland in 1602, and not less through his son, Archibald Primrose, who became also Clerk of the Privy Council, and subsequently Lord Clerk Register; and who received from Charles I. the title of a Baronet of Nova Scotia. This Sir Archibald Primrose drafted the celebrated Rescissory Act, which set aside as invalid the legislation of the Scots Parliament during the Commonwealth. The son of Sir Archibald Primrose was ennobled in 1700 under the title of Baron Primrose and Dalmeny, Viscount Rosebery, and later was created Earl of Rosebery in 1703. The present Earl of Rosebery is the fifth, having succeeded his grandfather in 1868. Lord Rosebery was born in 1847, and is thus in his forty-seventh year. He married in 1878 Hannah de Rothschild, daughter of Baron Meyer Amschel de Rothschild. Lady Rosebery died in 1890, leaving two sons and two daughters. Lord Rosebery attained his majority and succeeded to the estates almost simultaneously, and almost immediately thereafter entered public life. His slight, boyish figure, and fair, round, hairless face came to be familiar on political platforms about 1870. He did not and does not now look his years, and his ingenuous youth, coupled with an agreeable voice and an unusual facility of epigrammatic and humorous expression, won for him at once a popularity which many men of greater but less attractive gifts have toiled after fruitlessly. He was not rich, so he married money and regretted that he was not a Commoner that he might try his skill in debate with more worthy antagonists than he found in the sleepy occupants of the hereditary benches in the Chamber to which the unfortunate accident of his birth had compelled him to go. Lord Rosebery made his Parliamentary debut in 1871, when he seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in the House of Lords.

The evident success of his first appearance secured for him much flattering attention from his party, and the appointment at 25 years of age to a seat on the Scotch Educational Endowments Commission in 1872. But the defeat of the Liberals in 1874 prevented him from even the opportunity of occupying any post until the Liberals re-attained power in 1880. When Mr. Gladstone formed his Ministry in 1880, Lord Rosebery did not at first find a place. In August, 1881, however, he became Under Secretary for Home Affairs, Sir William Vernon Harcourt being Home Secretary. In 1883 he demitted office, on the ground, as stated at the time, that in Sir William Harcourt's view it was inexpedient that the Under Secretary for Home Affairs should be a member of the House of Lords. During the years of freedom from responsibility Lord Rosebery developed rapidly as a public speaker, and was to hold in some of his criticisms of the industrial system that he was dubbed for a time the "coronetted Socialist." In February, 1885, his claim to a prominent position in his party was fully vindicated and he became a member of the Cabinet with the sinecure office of Lord Privy Seal. The fall of Mr. Gladstone's Government in June, 1885, closed Lord Rosebery's brief tenure of office. But in February, 1886, he returned as a member of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet

The public excitement over the revelations was at its height, and the Opposition in the Dominion Parliament were manifesting much impatience over Lord Dufferin's course in refusing to dissolve Parliament upon the Minister's refusal to recommend a dissolution. So serious did the situation seem in England that Lord Kimberley, the Colonial Minister, selected Lord Rosebery to send on a secret mission, which really was to sound the feeling of the Canadian public upon Lord Dufferin's course. In the course of this piece of service he was introduced to Mr. Edward Blake and Mr. Mackenzie by Mr. J. D. Edgar, who, as chief Liberal whip, was much with Lord Rosebery. So impressed was Mr. Edgar with the brilliant qualities of the young Peer—then 26 years of age—that he remarked to a friend "that if that young man lived he would be Prime Minister of England."

The acquaintance formed then with Mr. Blake had a sequel, for previous to the first Home Rule Bill Lord Rosebery brought Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Blake together at his own country seat at Dalmeny Park and the two statesmen, English and Canadian, there discussed the details of the Home Rule scheme, which was then just being matured.

A NOVELTY IN SILK.

The New "Jeunesse" Which is Now the Rage in Paris.

The French women have opened their arms to a novelty in silk which is styled "Jeunesse."

The attractiveness of the material consists in a checkered, crimped effect. It really looks as if it had been accordion plaited crosswise of the goods and then given a lengthwise crimping in tiny squares. The crimp, however, is much finer than accordion plaitings and is done in weaving.

The jeunesse silk has the advantage that it is substantial and can be used for dresses for the house or street, even for summer in the country, for capes and fichus, and is especially adapted to making large puff sleeves, while matinees of it are fetching to the last degree. Silk blouses with lace or embroidered yoke and deep cuffs are made of it. It ruffles or forms a jabot with equal ease, and quaint dresses for little girls are made from it.

As for petticoats, an odd and pretty one sent out of a private establishment to wear with a new ball gown was made of the white jeunesse with several plaitings around the feet. For graduating frocks it will be very charming, as the material itself is too dainty to require any trimming and is adapted to the simplicity that graduating gowns require.

A favorite style of dress skirt is one either with a deep flounce set on a narrow yoke or a Spanish flounce with a double shirred heading set on the edge of a width of the material.

The shades of pink that run from a pale seashell hue to deep eminence are being freely bought to make summer dancing gowns, or blouses, or simple evening dresses, or those designed for piazza wear. Lace yokes or flounces can be used to good effect, and winter frocks can be freshened up with flounces or ruffles and waist of the jeunesse silk.

It is cool, being of the weight of china silk, and it is said to wash under skilful handling, and in any event cleans successfully.

A CONTRAST.

Ontario's Parliament building was finished within four or five years from the time when it was decided to erect it, and the total cost was well within a million and a half of dollars. New York State Capitol at Albany has been nearly thirty years under construction, and it is yet unfinished. According to the latest estimates it will take more money to finish building the Capitol at Albany than the whole cost of the Ontario building. Up to this year the expenditure has been $20 673 499. The site cost $533,180. Its purchase was completed in 1870. Work has been going on continuously ever since. At least, there has been appropriation for construction every year. The smallest since 1868 was in 1887, when only $51,473 was appropriated. That was the year when an indignant public revolted against being bled further and declared that if the Capitol was still unfinished it should be allowed to tumble to ruin rather than that such a scandalous extravagance should continue. During the three succeeding years, Capitol appropriations were kept down to a moderate figure. Then the old era of extravagance returned. "It's costly, but the Capitol must be finished," was the cry of the politicians. And the taxpayers sighed and assented, "We suppose it must."

PARIS, Feb.

BOMBS is the one word heard on all sides. The atmosphere is redolent with bombs, but happily of no more harmful nature than the sharp quick utterance with which the word is pronounced by the typical Parisian. It is to be feared that Paris will soon lose its reputation as the city of gayety and the world's favorite playground, unless the Government can discover more effectual weapons than those already used for fighting the Anarchists. A city where people are peppered with buckshot and pieces of rough lead while they are drinking beer or coffee and listening to music, or where diners at restaurants are stabbed in the stomach to punish them for their look of comfort in that region, can hardly be called gay without a suggestion of irony. Most people go to cafes to pass a pleasant hour or two in lively and good-tempered company; but if they feel that a bomb may explode any minute under one of the tables and riddle their legs with shot they are no longer at their ease. Fond as the Parisians are of excitement, they do not like it in this form.

If the execution of Vaillant was not exactly a carnavalesque performance on "Fat Monday," it was, nevertheless, generally thought to be a salutary one; and the next day the Parisians pelted one another with paper confetti, tickled one another's noses with peacock feathers, and romped like children on the boulevards. Vaillant and the other Anarchists were quite forgotten by the revellers. But there were those who did not forget the "martyr." Scores of morose-looking fellows have, since the execution, made a pilgrimage to the Ivry Cemetery, and have been seen standing at Vaillant's grave—probably swearing vengeance over it.

REGISTRATION OF THE FOREIGNERS A FAILURE.

Before the explosion in the cafe of the Hotel Terminus it was clear that in spite of the vigorous efforts made on the 1st of January to capture all suspected persons, those who had slipped through the meshes of the net in Paris alone were quite capable of carrying on the anti-social war. What is astonishing is that, notwithstanding all the secret police agents, who move everywhere in Paris, and the system theoretically followed in France of keeping every man of uncertain home and occupation under police surveillance, the Anarchists still find the means of procuring explosives and manufacturing bombs. This police system, so much vaunted as the most elaborate and perfect piece of mechanism of its kind, is evidently a failure. It is chiefly annoying to poor and honest persons, who are often treated as if they were rogues, whereas consular scoundrels can always trick the police, and they frequently pass themselves off as very respectable persons.

ANARCHISTS DON'T LIKE WORKMEN'S CLOTHES.

It is a peculiarity of the militant Anarchists that, although they may come from the dregs of society, they strive their utmost to dress like bourgeois, the very class which they have sworn to destroy. This, however, is not inconsistent, for envy and vanity are at the root of their crimes and their madness. Ravachol and Vaillant tried to look as little like workingmen as possible, and if the two jailbirds had been able to obtain for themselves what they wanted they would have been glad to number themselves with the bourgeois. The journeyman shoeman who stuck his awl into the Servian Minister just when the latter had finished dining, and Breton, the cardboard-maker, who threw the bomb at the Hotel Terminus, showed by their dress that they loathed the distinctive garb of a workman.

RUCHES AND COLLARETTES.

Ruches of ribbon finish the necks of capes and a bow and long ends is tied at the neck.

Later in the season collarette capes of lace and jet will make their appearance.

A collarette to be worn in the carriage affords but a slight protection, although it is very dressy; it consists of two collars of strawberry satin with an intervening one of black velvet; the fronts were pleated and descended a short distance below the waist.

MINCE IN CUPS.

How a Prejudice of the Children was Overcome.

A woman who has tried it says that the way things are served is as important to children as to their elders, oftentimes, although the former may not be able to formulate the difference. For example, she says, my children all of them dislike hash; no matter how carefully it was made it was invariably refused. One day it occurred to my cook to put the hash into little cups, and set them in the oven to brown. She did it, serving one to each plate, and since then "mince in cups," as it is judiciously called, is a favorite dish.

Provincial Expenditure.

The estimates for 1894 for a total expenditure of $3,415,663, by the Ontario Government, are as follows:

Civil Government	$ 244,005
Legislation	124,300
Administration of Justice	414,322
Education	6-5,142
Public Institutions maintenance	770,523
Immigration	8,225
Agriculture	177,775
Hospitals and charities	176,159
Maintenance and repair of Government and Departmental buildings	75,246
Public Buildings—
(1) Repairs	14,100
(2) Capital account	207,290
Public Works—
(1) Repairs	14,090
(2) Capital account	24,302
Colonization roads	104,372
Charges on Crown lands	125,909
Refund account	23,314
Miscellaneous expenditure	179,190
Unforeseen and unprovided	50,000
Current expenditure for 1894	3,058,386
On capital account	333,962
Other purposes	23,314
Amount of estimates	$3,415,663

The new outlays on public buildings which the estimates foreshadow amounts to $297,290. Of this the asylums for the insane receive the following: Toronto, $9 400; Mimico, $15,100; London, $15 100; Hamilton, $24 830; Kingston, $28,080. On the Central Prison the Government proposes to spend $26 000, and on the Belleville Deaf and Dumb Institute, $10,050. The district of Nipissing is to have $11,500 in public buildings. As this session is to be followed by an election the estimates for colonization roads possess special interest. The Government asks for $104,370 for this purpose, of which the North Division is to get $23,170, the West Division $19,600, and the East Division $34,300, while $27,300 is for general purposes.

Afternoon Teas.

The habit of taking afternoon tea in the Russian fashion, with a slice of lemon instead of milk, is growing in favor among women. There is no doubt that the beverage is less bilious this way, and that the delicate flavor of the fragrant leaf can be more easily appreciated. Tea tasters, when engaged in sampling, never put milk or cream into their cups, which would only serve to make discrimination between the various blends the more difficult.—London Lady.

Catharine's Wonderful Watch.

When Catharine of Russia was on the throne, an ingenious peasant presented her with a marvelous watch, which is at present being exhibited in St. Petersburg. In size and shape it somewhat resembles a chicken's egg. When wound up to the proper pitch, it plays religious chants accompanied with scenic effects.

he became a member of the Cabinet with the sinecure office of Lord Privy Seal. The fall of Mr. Gladstone's Government in June, 1885, closed Lord Rosebery's brief tenure of office. But in February, 1886, he returned as a member of Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet with the greatly improved position of Foreign Secretary. In March of the same year there occurred the split in the Liberal ranks when Mr. Chamberlain and his friends broke away from their party. Lord Rosebery remained with his chief, and left office with him at mid-summer, 1886.

He became a member for the London County Council in 1889; he was elected the First Chairman, with general public approval.

Lord Rosebery's claim to the Premiership undoubtedly rests very largely upon his work as Chairman of the London County Council. His three years' career in that capacity has earned for him a reputation for shrewdness, for skilfulness in managing men and for great capacity in grappling with complicated detail, which are all recognized to be essential qualities in the superior man of affairs.

When Mr. Gladstone resumed office in 1892, Lord Rosebery naturally became Foreign Secretary; no other appointment was possible. Certain indefinable signs have appeared that he has conducted affairs at the Foreign Office with a firm hand. Even his political opponents, and perhaps most of all these, have recognized this to the full. It is a little difficult, from any specific acts of his, to justify fully the prevailing conception that he is an ideal Foreign Secretary, yet the past two years have been characterized by no blunders, and, in the case of Egypt and otherwise, he has been sufficiently emphatic to please even the jingo tendencies that still remain or periodically revive in England.

PREVIOUS APPOINTMENTS.

After his debut in political life, Lord Rosebery filled a number of appointments, which, in their graduated scale of importance, give a picture of his gradual rise in the political world. In the same session as that in which he made his first speech he made his first important political move by proposing an amendment to the Government Education Bill for Scotland, which aimed at the exclusion of catechisms from Public Schools, thus early showing his strong stand upon the question of national education. He spoke in the same session on Lord Russell's motion regarding the Alabama treaty, and was appointed to serve on the commission to inquire into endowments in Scotland. In the session of 1873 he moved for and obtained a committee of inquiry on the supply of horses in the country. The result of the committee's investigations was the remission of the tax on horses. During the session of 1874 he moved for and was made Chairman of the Committee on Scotch and Irish Representative Peerage. In October, 1874, he acted as President of the Social Science Congress, which met in Glasgow. On Nov. 16th, 1878, he was elected Lord Rector of Aberdeen University, in succession to the late Mr. W. E. Forster. In 1880 Edinburgh University conferred the same honor upon him, his inaugural lecture not being delivered until November 4th, 1882. In Aug., 1881, he was made Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, in succession to Mr. Leonard Courtney, who was transferred to the Colonial Office. He resigned this in June, 1884, and in November, 1884, became First Commissioner of Works, in succession to Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, who became Postmaster-General, in succession to Mr. Fawcett. In 1884 he moved for a select committee to inquire into the best means of improving the efficiency of the House of Peers. In 1886 Lord Rosebery became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and held the office during Mr. Gladstone's short Ministry. In 1888 Cambridge conferred upon him the degree of LL.D. On January 17, 1889, he was, with Sir John Lubbock, elected member for the city division of the newly constituted London County Council, and on February 12th he was elected Chairman of that body. He held this office till June, 1890, when he resigned, and was succeeded by Sir John Lubbock. He made an ideal chairman, and the limitation of speeches to 15 minutes and constant application of closure under his careful guidance resulted in an enormous amount of work being done. In 12 months he presided over 44 public meetings of the Council, and attended 280 regular committee meetings, besides nearly as many informal meetings. On November 19, 1890, Lady Rosebery died of typhoid fever. In November, 1891, Lord Rosebery's monograph on William Pitt appeared.

LORD ROSEBERY IN CANADA.

Many Canadian public men will remember Lord Rosebery's visit to Canada in 1873, at the time of the Pacific Railway scandal. Then the old era of extravagance returned. "It's costly, but the Capitol must be finished," was the cry of the politicians. And the taxpayers sighed and assented, "We suppose it must."

Thirteen months ago Governor Flower estimated that the building could be finished for $2,251,025, but after spending a third of that sum it is now estimated that $3,000 000 more will be needed. There are now 1,600 men employed on the construction of the Capitol. They are appointed by Commissioner Perry on the recommendation of the State officers, political committees and members of the Legislature. Not a man gets a job unless he has the backing of some politician. The work has become simply a public trough at which the Albany spellmen can feed their clamorous supporters. We may be thankful that Ontario enjoys better government than New York.

A Difference Now.

He loved the girl.

That was plain to the most casual observer.

He sent her flowers.

He wanted her to go with him everywhere he went.

Every spare moment he devoted to her.

When he was beside her he was the willing slave of her every wish.

Did she drop her fan, he was the first to pick it up.

Did she want a glass of nectar, he flew to fetch it.

Did she want an easier chair, he moved all the furniture in the room in order to gratify her.

Did she ask this or that, he was only too glad to be of service.

Theatre tickets and drives and confectionery and books and all manner of pretty little souvenirs were for her alone.

His voice was a flute note for her always; and his days were spent in thoughts of her.

But that was years ago.

How different now.

He married her.—London Tit Bits.

He Made It All Right.

Manager (to new clerk, who has just entered with a look of great complacency upon his countenance)—Well, you caught the post with those two letters?

New clerk—Yes, sir—just managed it; but you had made a funny mistake. You put the 2½ stamp on the London letter and the 1d stamp on the foreign one.

Manager—Dear me; very stupid. What did you do?

New clerk—Oh, I made it all right, sir. I only noticed it just before I put them in the box, but there was still a minute to spare, so I slipped into the post-office and altered the addresses.—Ex.

Advertising That Paid.

It has been asked, "Does advertising pay?" A German journal, the Mainzer Nachrichten, replies to this question by giving the following fact, the authenticity of which it guarantees: A person advertised that he would pay five marks to the sender of the largest potato. In less than fifteen days the clever advertiser found himself in the possession of as many sacks full of the very finest potatoes, which, after paying the five marks promised for the largest sample, might be reckoned a very profitable speculation.

The Escape.

"My son," said Mr. Binks, with a frown, "Mr. Walderf says he was hit behind the ear with a piece of putty this morning. Were you the boy that blew that piece of putty?"

"I cannot say, papa," said Willie. "Pieces of putty are so much alike that I doubt if I could identify mine." And then the old man took the boy upstairs and administered a few love-taps.

CHARTRES GOES A-HUNTING.

The Duc de Chartres is trying to revive the old hunting days in the forest of Chantilly. The dress of the guests and other gentlemen following the hounds consists of a long blue d'Orleans redingote reaching to the knees, with one row of buttons and without pockets, the collar of blue velvet; waistcoat the same, without braid; white breeches, the buttons gold on a silver ground, with a "V" (veneris) entwined with "O" (for Orleans). For the men the color of the cloth is lighter. The whipper-in and the man on horseback have the same form of costume. The facings are a horseshoe of braid, one gold and two silver, straight collar of the same braid, a waistcoat covered with silver braid and pockets with three points. The men on foot wear a short jacket well braided; the breeches of blue velvet, and the buttons silver with "V" and "O" in the middle. The equipment of the Duc de Chartres represents the old traditions of his ancestors who were renowned for their hunting parties, and brought to one's memory the old song of the Orleans:

Par Saint Hubert, mon patron, C'est quelque duc de haut renom, un noir pacfroi,
Qu'envierait un roi se dresse et boudit sous lui,
Sonnez, ecuyers et piqueurs,
Un duc d'Orleans vient en ces lieux.

ELECTION OF THE MID LENT QUEEN.

Mademoiselle, the blanchisseuse who was chosen as being the fittest to fulfil the role of Mid-Lent Carnival Queen, is a sweet pot divinely brune. Dimples and smiles play hide-and-seek on the bebe face of this highly-honored Miss Marie Bonhomme, who has not yet seen eighteen summers run their course in this wicked, wearying world. These assembled in the Cafe de la Republique to watch the election of this young sovereign more than envied the position of the President of the Corporation, who could imprint with impunity a couple of kisses on Mademoiselle's apple cheeks. The head of the committee of students was also in luck's way. On presenting her with a ring in the name of his confreres he was allowed to salute her in the tenderest manner.

PARISIAN PROPRIETY OF SALOON KEEPERS

Much to the dismay of late night-birds, whose maxim runs somewhat as this effect: "On il y a de la gene il n'y a point de plaisir," a boulevardier reports that all certain restaurants the managers, taken with a sudden fit of propriety, intend henceforth to exact full evening dress on the part of their naughty midnight clients. Hats and bonnets will have to be unknown quantities, and, of course, low bodices will be derigueur. However, not content with forming these rules, ces messieurs are thinking of reforming the guild beauties in the way of manner and general deportment. The sight of a lady standing on the table or kicking up her heels con furore is hardly edifying to a young bride brought in tow by her husband to an opposite table. But, on the other hand, an over-dose of propriety spells ruin to midnight restaurateurs. The police are passive in these matters of morality, and rarely, if ever, interfere with the pleasures of those who prefer to seek their amusements by night rather than by day.

A CHAT WITH SARAH BERNHARDT.

Sarah Barnhardt, as every one knows, is a spendthrift and has not kept one cent of the pile which she has earned in her marvelous career; nor does she spare anything new. The fact is, she cannot do so. As I was talking to her, says an interviewer, in a room communicating with the dining-room in her hotel in the Boulevard Perelre, I heard the noise of a child, which, to say the truth, was a very cross and naughty voice. "My little devil of a granddaughter," said Sarah, with a laugh. "You hear! I am a grandmother, though I do not look it; she is thoroughly spoiled, but so pretty." "Does she live with you?" I asked. "No; she only comes every day for her meals with her parents, and I have entire charge of her—of them all"—she went on laughing, "because you see my money must go," and she raised her long thin hands against the light to show that between each finger was a wide opening. "It must pass through these when I get it, and I shall not leave a sou to Maurice and his family; therefore I have arranged things in this way: Maurice's wife, Princess Jablonovska, has brought him 40,000 francs a year, and I will not have them touch this income, but it must accumulate and multiply for them to find a good lump after my death—oh the ugly were," she said shivering; "till then I defray all their expenses and have their bills sent to me; this is so much saved out of the fire!"

SAINT JEANNE D'ARC.

If disembodied spirits of the better sort have the faculty of keeping themselves informed of all that goes on in this world and if a sense of humor be not incompatible with their state of perfection, the Maid of Orleans must smile rather frequently at the vivacity with which the French are now quarrelling on her account. They are no longer indifferent to her merits, notwithstanding their ingratitude towards her for more than 400 years, but they are separated into two extremely hostile camps over the question whether she was a saint or merely a heroine endowed with military genius. She might have been forgotten for another 400 years or so, but for all that happened in 1870 and in subsequent years to mortify French pride. The revival of the old rivality towards England—mainly in consequence of the turn of events in Egypt—began to be a chain of circumstances which has thrown the figure of the Domremy heroine into such strong relief of late.

ROW WITH THE CLERICALS.

The French mind turned back to the past, and became dazzled by that strong light of the closing Middle Ages, Jeanne D'Arc, shining across the dead centuries. Her history was revived, her statue was multiplied, politicians and churchmen, painters, sculptors and publicists threw themselves into the new movement; even the imitators of Voltaire took up the cult of the "Pucelle" whom their apostle had so scandalously ridiculed and traduced. Meanwhile nothing is more comic than the fury of the Radicals at the insult, as they consider it, which has been offered to the memory of Jeanne D'Arc. The act of declaring Jeanne "venerable" is described as an "unspeakable outrage." Leo XIII. a foreign Pontiff living out of the world of modern science and manners, is asked if he is trying to cast ridicule upon "the admirable daughter of the people, the humble peasant who had the good fortune to deliver France from the yoke of the enemy?" All true Republicans are advised to put a stop to any further "clerical" demonstrations in honor of the venerable Jeanne d'Arc by hooting and whistling. The clerical papers reply to such writing somewhat in this fashion: "She is our Jeanne, not yours; you will never make a freethinker or a revolutionist of her now."

A PRINCE AND HIS LADY LOVE

Don Fabrizio Massimo, Duke of Anticoli, and grandson on his mother's side of the late Duchesse de Berry, is about to marry Princess Eugenie Bonaparte, daughter of Prince Charles Bonaparte, who served under Bazaine at Metz, and niece of the Empress Eugenie. Only a year ago Don Fabrizio played a conspicuous part in a highly romantic adventure, which might have interfered with his matrimonial prospects. He fell in love with the pretty daughter of a Roman citizen, and ran away with her. His intentions appear to have been honorable, for he sent no time in presenting his inamorata to a priest who undertook to conciliate his parents. Princess Massimo raised no opposition to her son's wishes, but only stipulated that "the young person" should go through a period of probation in a convent. Meanwhile the affair got talked about and insinuations as to the girl's motives were spread abroad. She was frequently charged with having entrapped the son of one of the oldest families of Italy into a mesalliance.

FIRST SHE WOULD AND THEN SHE WOULDN'T.

Scarcely two months since the young couple, with the full consent of their respective parents, presented themselves to the Capitol to go through the ceremony of a civil marriage. The Prince, on being asked the usual question, "Will thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife?" replied "Yes!" in a very decided fashion; but when the same formula was addressed to the bride, her answer was equally vigorous "No!" She was determined to vindicate her honor even at the cost of her heart, and nothing could induce her to alter her resolve. The Prince has been speedily consoled, but Parisians are anxious to learn whether the lady's wound has healed as satisfactorily.

SOUND SENSE FOR GIRLS

Especially Country Girls Who Sigh for City Life.

The Big Towns Are Overcrowded, and When a Young Woman Has a Good Home 'Tis Folly for Her to Leave It—Advice Worth Heeding.

Right to the point is the following readable little article from the New York Sun: We all know the girl who writes, "I want to come to the city and earn my living; what chance have I?" She writes us from Timbuctoo and from the country town where we used to live ourselves. She can do "most anything, you know," to earn money, from painting a plaque to writing editorials on the ocean riches of the tariff; and the town she was born and brought up in, where everybody calls her by her first name and likes her, where she has a sunny little room all to herself and a new gown whenever she cries for it, won't hold her any longer. Now here is an answer to that girl that a woman wrote who knew what she was talking about. There should be a special Act of Congress passed providing that this letter should be printed, framed and hung in every country school-house, every village seminary, every small city high school. The woman's name is Martha Everts Holden, and the ambitious girl of whom she writes had written to her:

"I felt like posting an immediate answer and saying, 'Stay where you are.' I didn't do it, though, for I knew it would be useless. The girl is bound to come, and come she will. And she will drift into a third-rate boarding house, than which if there is anything meaner—let us pray. And if she is pretty she will have to carry herself like snow on high hills to avoid contamination. If she is confiding and innocent, the fate of that highly-persecuted heroine of old-fashioned romance, Clarissa Harlowe, is before her. If she is homely, the doors of opportunity are firmly closed against her. If she is smart, she will, perhaps, succeed in earning enough money to pay her board bill and have sufficient left over to indulge in the maddening extravagance of an occasional paper of pins or a ball of tape. What if, after hard labor and repeated failure, she does secure something like success? No sooner will she do so than up will step some dapper young man who will beckon her over the border into the land where troubles just begin. She won't know how to sew or bake or make good coffee, for such arts are liable to be overlooked when a girl makes a career for herself; and so love will gallop away over the hills like a riderless steed and happiness will flare like a light in a windy night.

"Oh, no, my little country maid, stay where you are if you have a home and friends. Be content with fishing for trout in the brook rather than ornithology a stormy sea for whales. A great city is a cruel place for young lives. It takes them as the older press takes juicy apples, sun-kissed and flavored with the breath of the hills and crushes them into pulp. There is a spoonful of juice in each apple, but cider is cheap. The girl of whose success you read is, in nine cases out of ten, the girl with a friend at court who gives her the opportunity to show what she can do. Without such a friend the path of the lone girl in a great city is a briery, uphill track."

THE FARMER'S WIFE.

She Often Has More Than Her Own Share of Burdens to Bear.

I can see her, a faded, haggard, sallow woman, tired from the weary rising in the dark winter morning, to the crawling from the unfinished pile of mending to the cold room upstairs, at night. Her husband is kind to her; but he has his own work; and her back aches, she is dizzy and faint, and life owes a heavier load on her shoulders every day. She does not consider that her health is part of the home's capital; and she is sure that they cannot afford to hire help, behindhand as they are; they can't afford a doctor (who would ride ten miles and charge five dollars), but she remembers that the last time she was at church she heard one of the society speak of a patent medicine that helped her last spring, and she will send for the medicine. Or else she writes to the household paper (price fifty cents a year) which she takes, asking the editor's advice. What pathetic and suggestive things are the correspondence columns in these humble journals! Glasgow's Systematic Campaign Against Public and Private Dirt.

LIGHTS ON COMMON STAIRS.

Municipal Swimming Baths, Hot Baths and Washing Houses—What They Cost and How They Are Patronized—Entertainments Also Provided by the City at Low Cost.

TWENTY years ago, says a Scottish correspondent, Glasgow began a campaign against domestic dirt. The war has been carried on with some energy, and the militant example of the Scotch city has been imitated by other towns in Great Britain. But after an experience of two decades Glasgow finds that the plan of campaign upon which she originally started to carry the gospel of cleanliness into the most unclean parts of the town has not been as efficacious as its promoters had hoped. The drawback seems to have been that the operations were not sufficiently diffused; the forces of soap and water were not divided with sufficient minuteness, they were concentrated at a half a dozen large centres, around which, within a radius of a quarter of a mile, a prodigious amount of washing and scrubbing had been carried on, the place without the radius, however, being left practically untouched.

What Glasgow did was to establish a system of PUBLIC BATHS AND WASH HOUSES.

She erected five large buildings in as many districts of the town. A description of one of these buildings is a description of all. The cost of construction was from $35,000 to $50,000 on each edifice. The total capital outlay, which includes the cost of land for these five baths and wash house buildings, has been, up to the present, something over $600 000. The baths are open from 7 o'clock in the morning till 8.30 at night, except on Sundays, when they are open for an hour and a half from 7 a. m. till 830 a. m.

I need not say that the buildings are very substantial. They would not be Scotch if they were not substantial. The most conspicuous object in any of the bathing houses is the huge swimming tank, holding capacity of nearly 100,000 gallons. It is 75 feet long, 40 feet broad, 6 feet 10 inches deep at its deep end, and 3 feet 6 inches deep at its shallow end. Its bottom and sides are faced with white glazed tiles. The water is always maintained at a comfortable temperature, so that in the winter as well as in the summer the baths are much resorted to. The provided by the municipality accommodated in the last year accounted for 453 718 bathers. Very naturally, when the temperature of the outdoor air is high, the baths do their largest business. An outdoor temperature of 70° is considered a high one in Glasgow, and when the mercury marks that figure the swimming ponds bring in weekly receipts of $640. In some cases there are swimming baths for women as well as for men, but in places where the double accommodation has not been provided, certain hours are set apart for the use of the baths by either sex. The charge for admission to the swimming ponds is 4 cents for adults and 2 cents for persons under 13 years of age. Packages of tickets can be purchased at reduced rates. Swimming clubs may engage one of the big baths for $1 50 a night. If the club has more than 40 members an additional charge of 2 cents is made for every person in excess of that number. In the summer the water in the great baths is changed daily; in the winter once or twice a week.

In each main building are little rooms, separately fitted with tubs for hot baths. The use of one of these baths can be had for 4 cents, or for 8 cents, according to the accommodation.

THE WASH HOUSES

which are attached to the bathing buildings are worthy the attention of all dwellers in cities, not merely because the accommodations are provided by the municipality—by no means equally well provided by private enterprise—but because they show what has been done in the way of economizing number of families each place has to accommodate. A good cheap experiment would be to equip one back court with 'always ready' facilities for bathing and for washing clothes. Statistics gathered from its workings would in a few months enable us to decide whether a scheme on the same lines could be formulated for the greater part of the city. The annual expenditure connected with one establishment would be the interest on the small outlay, fuel, gas, wages for neighboring tenant as attendant. Whatever the expenditure might amount to it probably would easily be met by small charges. The could be supplied by the bathers themselves." Such a scheme would make the baths and wash houses available to those districts where they are most needed.

If any one wishes to work out a similar plan in American cities, he may find the following figures useful. Glasgow's experience is that the annual revenue per square yard from the existing baths and wash houses is as follows:

Wash houses, including machine room	$3 18
Hot baths for males, including spectators' gallery	8 81
Hot baths for females, including spectators' gallery	2 47
Swimming baths for males	2 68
Swimming baths for females	1 20

The five establishments at present in operation pay more than their working expenses, but the city has to make up a slight annual deficit of $10,000 to $15 000 to cover interest charges, etc. This deficit decreases every year as the patronage of the establishment increases.

About four years ago Glasgow went into

THE ENTERTAINMENT BUSINESS.

A large building known as "St. Andrew's Halls" had been erected at a cost of something like $600,000. There was a large hall, and there were smaller halls, under one roof. There was a great organ, and there were other attractions of equipment. In the great hall 4,000 people could be seated. Other apartments and salons were of various sizes, designed to accommodate varying numbers of persons from 100 upward. The owners of the property got into financial difficulties, and the municipality had the opportunity to purchase the building and its contents for about a third of the original cost. The opportunity was not allowed to slip. Glasgow bought the building for $200,000, and expended $30,000 more in improvements. The halls are used for any number of purposes. They are let by the city for all kinds of entertainments and public meetings, and in the great hall, throughout the winter, weekly concerts are held under the management of the municipality. The concerts are given on Saturday afternoon, Saturday afternoon being holiday time in Glasgow, and they are intended chiefly to attract the "working classes." A trifle admission fee is charged—from 2 to 5 or 6 cents—and the great hall is always crowded on these occasions. Glasgow that is to say, the stairs of the tenement houses and flats and office buildings, just as it lights the streets—at the public expense. There are 30,000 gas jets on the common stairs of Glasgow, and the expense of maintaining them is a little less than $50,000 annually. The gas business of the city is in the hands of the municipal corporation. Twenty five million cubic feet of gas is the estimated production of the works. The consumers pay at the rate of 62 cents per 1,000 feet. Glasgow's proximity to the coal fields has, of course, much to do with this low cost, but, as one of the municipal reports recently pointed out, "the gas committee have already to go further afield for a suitable quality and sufficient quantity of gas-yielding coal; and by reason of scarcity and distance combined we now have to pay from 50 to 75 per cent. more for coal than we did five years ago, and as a consequence consumers may soon have to pay a higher price for their gas." The municipality has also undertaken the business of supplying electric light. But the very moderate cost of gas has, up to the present time, served to effectually prevent a further establishment of the electric system. It is now proposed, however, to erect electric lighting plants at each of the several gas works, and to use the refuse of the works as fuel for driving the dynamos, a process having been invented which, it is believed, will render the practice effective and economical.

LIGHTS ITS COMMON STAIRS,

Amber Soup.—To cold gravy and milk, or milk alone, add a carrot, an onion, a small turnip, and one cupful of cold, boiled tapioca. Heat, add one cupful of cream, and serve.

Asparagus soup is very palatable if made from the fresh vegetable, but the canned article is inferior. Skin the stalks and cut them into inch lengths. Stew in salted water till all are tender. Drain nearly dry, season, and add milk thickened, as for the other soups. Do not make it very thick, and use about a pint of milk to a cup of cooked asparagus.

Bean soup may be made from either the fresh or the canned "stringless" beans. If the canned are used they do not need any cooking, and very little seasoning, but add a little piece of butter. Make like asparagus soup.

Bean Soup, No. 2.—To one pint of boiled white beans, or cold baked beans, add two quarts of stock; season and heat. When ready to serve add one sliced, hard-boiled egg.

Celery Cream Soup.—Boil one cupful of rice in three pints of milk, till it will pass through a sieve. Add two heads of celery picked into small pieces, and one pint of cold stock or milk. Boil till the celery is tender, and then season.

Carrot Soup.—Brown an onion, sliced thin, in two teaspoonfuls of butter. Add four of finely chopped ham, and four of grated carrots. When brown add two quarts of soup stock or milk, and boil one hour. Serve with toast.

Onion soup may be made from little silver-skinned onions. The red onions are too strong. Skin and quarter them. Boil in two salted waters till tender. Add a pint of thickened milk, half a cupful of cream and onions.

Pea soup may be made from green or dried peas. If dried, soak them over night, and cook till soft. If the green ones are used cook them till soft, adding a small pinch of soda. They may be passed through a sieve or not. When done, drain, add two cups of stock or milk and season. Have ready a paste made of one egg, beaten with a tablespoonful of cream, a pinch of salt, and enough flour stirred in to make the paste as thick as can be rolled out. Roll in a thin sheet, and cut in small squares. When the soup boils, drop these in, and when cooked through, skim out into the soup tureen. Thicken the soup a little with flour, and pour over them. Serve with crackers which have been heated into the oven.

Potato soup may be made quickly from cold mashed potatoes left from a previous meal, or cold boiled ones cut in cubes. If you have a cup of cold white stock or gravy, heat it with a cup and a half of rich milk, and season. If the stock or gravy are not at hand, use two cups of milk and a piece of butter. When it is hot, add the potatoes and a little cold rice if you have it. When thoroughly heated it is ready to serve.

Squash Soup.—Peel and slice thin enough squash to fill a pint bowl. Boil in one quart of salted water till it may be rubbed through a sieve. When smooth, add one cupful of cream, one pint of cold gravy, a cup of boiling water, and a tablespoonful of butter and flour rubbed smooth. Boil up once and serve.

Tomato soup, or tomato bisque, may be made from fresh tomatoes, or from the canned, if freshly opened. If they have been opened more than an hour or two, they are apt to be acid. If fresh ones are used, scald and peel them, cut them up small, and stew till each piece is thoroughly cooked. Strain, and to the liquor add a piece of butter, pepper and salt, and about one-half a teaspoonful of sugar to a pint of tomatoes. Let come to a boil, add a pinch of soda, to counteract the acid, and boil till the froth subsides. Add a pint of rich milk, and thicken with a tablespoonful of flour made smooth in cold milk. Serve hot, with toast.

Vegetable Soup.—Peel, slice and fry in butter three onions, six potatoes, six carrots and four turnips. Pour over them two quarts of boiling water, and stew slowly till the vegetables are done. Strain and serve.

How the ineradicable woman longing to be attractive comes out in queer prescriptions to prevent the hair falling out, to remove freckles, or to make over old gowns with small sleeves into the flamboyant style of the day; how the woman's heart peeps through its thin disguise in those pitiful letters describing lonely lives and love that the strong years conquer, and the daily jar and fret of dissatisfied toil, and all the rest of the dismal story. I seem to see the broken woman, who was a joyous and ambitious girl, tugging ever more wearily at her Sisyphus stone of duties, growing more irritable, more complaining as strength and beauty fail, until the day shall come when the tired mother will not creep down stairs. Then the neighbors will watch and nurse by turns, and the doctor, who might have helped years ago, will be called in to witness properly the end that he cannot avert.—Octave Thanet in the March Scribner's.

READS IN SPANISH.

Cuban Cigarmakers Pay a Man to Translate the News.

The Spanish-speaking cigarmakers in this town, writes a New York correspondent of the St. Louis Post Dispatch, employ a man to read to them while they are at work. In no other industry is this thing done, though it would seem that other workers "by the piece" could imitate the Cubans to advantage. Not only do they keep in tone with all the news, but it keeps them from talking, and there isn't a minute of their time wasted.

The Cubans are great talkers, and this is what probably started the custom in the cigar factories of Havana.

Julian Barreda is one of the readers, and he is employed just now in two factories. "In the morning," said he, "I read from the newspapers. In the afternoon I read to them out of some book. Just now I am reading 'Gil Blas' in one shop and a Spanish novel called 'The Two Sisters,' in another. When I have finished a novel I select half a dozen others that I think will suit them and read them a list of titles. Then they vote on which one I shall begin.'

are worthy the attention of all dwellers in cities, not merely because the accommodations are provided by the municipality—they could be equally well provided by private enterprise—but because they show what has been done in the way of supplying a need which exists in all thickly populated places.

A washing house consists, first, of a large apartment divided by low iron partitions into a number of "stalls," each stall being provided with a complete washing apparatus, set tubs, hot and cold water baths, scrubbing boards, soap, etc. Each stall has a sliding rack which can be pushed into a steam drying closet extending the entire length of the room. The wash house at Townhead is the largest wash house of the lot, containing 78 stalls. The smallest house, that at Gorbals, has 58 stalls.

The wash house facilities are placed at the disposal of the poor women of Glasgow at a charge of 4 cents an hour. Two hours is found to be the average time required by each patron of the place.

Now, a notable fact in connection with the wash house is that while the city provides 316 "stalls," there are only 3,000 families who appear to take advantage of the accommodation. Each stall is used by nine or ten women in the course of a week. Twenty hours a week, or less than three hours per day, is the average demand upon each stall. There must be a reason why the municipal apparatus is not more frequently used. And there is a reason. The city made the mistake of building five large establishments instead of a great number of small ones. It is proved by experience that there are few women having a family's washing to manage who are inclined to carry their loads more than a quarter of a mile from their dwellings and a quarter of a mile back again. This fact has led the enterprising men of Glasgow to project a scattered throughout the city, perhaps one to each tenement block. The latter scheme, however, has not yet passed the visionary stage, nor is it likely to do so for a while. Another interesting fact is that the 3,000 women who are known to use the places do so at least once a week, so that the yearly cost of the family washing is estimated at about $4. When we consider the facilities provided, it is reasonable to suppose that the work is done better and cheaper than it could be performed by the aid of the primitive appliances available to the women in their own homes.

Experience shows that the most satisfactory, that is to say, the most popularly used features of the establishments are the swimming baths. They fulfil the expectations which they were built to realize. But the individual hot water baths and the wash house arrangements do not fulfil the expectations so far as concerns popular use. People will go much farther for a swim than they will go to wash their clothes, or to merely bathe their bodies. This, at least, is Glasgow's experience, and it is practically determined that no more large wash houses, and no more extensive ranges of individual bath tubs, will be put up at the expense of the municipality. What farther work is done in providing accommodation of this sort will take the shape of establishments easily accessible. But whether the municipality will feel itself justified in planting a large number of such houses around the town, or in hiring existing premises for the purpose, or whether property owners or public companies will see their way to take up the work remains to be seen. The municipality has determined nothing with relation to the subject. Still, what has been found is that the facilities created by the expenditure of £123 000 seem to be taken advantage of by comparatively small clusters of people, one might say small districts, when we consider that, out of the whole population, the only persons who use the facilities are 3 000 washers; 5,000 hot bathers and 5,000 swimmers. Officials associated with the management of the places seem to think that buildings without swimming baths, and provided with 30 tubs for hot-water bathing, and 63 stalls for clothes washing, would average in yearly earnings, say, $5,000 apiece, and that a couple of hundred such establishments might be if judiciously situated. In other words, the mistake heretofore made has been in attaching the hot baths and the wash houses to the swimming baths, and the following suggestion is put to the Town Council: "Whether hot water or steam be or be not supplied from a central station, perfect self-contained establishments can be erected at a cost for each of from $300 upward, the price depending upon the

The knees must be loose, the hips loose; she must be able to kick high, not a quick, spasmodic kick, but a graceful raising and lowering of the feet. The head and shoulders must be kept well back. In fact, every muscle of the body, from the neck to the feet, must be in as perfect condition and subjection as a gymnast's.

"After my first lesson I ached from head to foot, and could hardly walk; it was not so hard while I was really at work, but when I stopped to rest I became stiff all over, and the mere idea of going upstairs to dress was torture to me. It is Well.

Yes, it is well! The evening shadows lengthen;
Home's golden gate shines on our ravished sight;
And though the tender ties we try to strengthen Break one by one—at evening time 'tis light.

'Tis well! The way was often dull and weary;
The spirit fainted oft beneath its load;
No sunshine came from skies all gray and dreary,
And yet our feet were bound to tread that road.

'Tis well that not again our hearts shall shiver
Beneath old sorrows once so hard to bear;
That not again beside death's darksome river
Shall we deplore the good, the loved, the fair.

No more, with tears wrought from deep inner anguish
Shall we bewail the dear hopes crushed and gone;
No more need we in doubt or fear to languish,
So far the day is past, the journey done.

As voyagers, by fierce winds beat and broken,
Come into port beneath the calmer sky;
So we, still bearing on our brows the token
Of tempest past, draw to our haven nigh.

As sweeter air comes from the shores immortal,
Inviting homeward at the day's decline,
Almost we see where from the open portal
Fair forms stand beckoning with their smiles divine.

'Tis well! The earth, with all her myriad voices,
Has lost the power our senses to enthrall,
We hear, above the tumult and the noises,
Soft tones of music, like an angel's call.

'Tis well, O friends! We should not turn—retracing
The long, vain years, nor call our lost youth back;
Gladly, with spirits braced, the future facing,
We leave behind the dusty, footworn track.

Poets should not reason;
Let them sing!
Argument is treason—
Bells should ring.

He may use deduction
Who must preach;
He may praise instruction
Who must teach;

But the poet duly Fills his part
When the song burst truly
From his heart.

For no purpose springing
For no self;
He must do the singing
For itself.

Not in lines austerely
Let him build;
Not the surface merely Let him gild.

Fearless, univ
Like a spring
Opal-worms, enlightened,
Let him sing.

As the leaf grows sunward
Songs must grow;
As the steam flows onward
Song must flow.

Roses die,
But their breath gives pleasure—
God knows why!

How Married Women and Widows Fascinate the Men.

"BAB" ON SOCIAL SANDPAPER.

Agrees With Weller as to Widows—Matrons Dangerous Too—The Servant Girl Question—Getting a Cook—Untruthful Women.

I believe some one has written a book intended to explain fully why married women are more attractive to men than are blushing maidens. There may be a sufficient number of reasons for this to make a book, but I am rather inclined to doubt it. Married women, and under this heading, of course, come widows, are attractive to men for the simple reason that they understand them. If they are fortunate enough to have met good men, in capacity of husbands, they have great belief in mankind in general; if they are unfortunate enough to have met bad men, then they lack all belief in mankind, but they have learned how to conceal their own feelings. The blind confidence of the young girl in a man is only pleasing to the extremely young, or the extremely old; that is to say, to those who are just out of long clothes, or those who are reaching the state commonly known as second childhood.

A MAN OF THE WORLD IS ATTRACTED

by a young girl's pretty face—he has long ago given up dancing, and he proposes to shew his courtesy to her by saying to her all the complimentary things he can think of in the best turned phrases. But the young girl's eyes wander over the room; she wishes somebody would ask her to dance; and she is restless and preoccupied, and looks vastly relieved when the man, who only shines as far as his feet are concerned, comes up to her, rudely interrupts the conversation, takes her off and prances her to her satisfaction. Now a matron or a widow would not make such a mistake as this; she knows there is more interest shewn in you when a man wishes to talk to you than when he wishes to dance with you. The young girl is too apt to be worried and upset by little disagreeables, and makes the men around her conscious of her crossness and displeased by her expression of it.

To sum it all up, the matron or the widow is like a lion-tamer,

SHE KNOWS THE BEAST,

and she knows how to manage him. She knows that he likes being made much of, that he wishes to be thought of first, and that he likes to think that he is the one who is loved and not the one who loves. Unlike the lion tamer, the adept in ruling man does not have a hot iron to touch him with whenever he grows restless or disobeys, but she has an iron that enters his soul, and which can only be described by calling it the iron of femininity; that is to say, when flattery does not prevail, when tyranny is useless, the best of all weapons is called into service, and the woman avows herself the weakest of all humanity, so she may gain what she wishes, for he who believes himself strongest is he who will be most lenient to those he considers lack his power. Then, too, the matron or the widow realizes that, when the busy day is over, and the man is out in the social world, it interests him to listen to that idle chatter of women compounded by some nonsense, a little sense, a little sarcasm, a little wickedness and a little wit. Whereas, the young girl continually "wants to know" and expects the man who is closest to her to explain all unknown situations, and to give her in full the histories of the various people whom she has never seen before. The other woman understands the appetite of the man and caters to it. They don't ask him to criticise pays or books while he is eating terrapin; they don't want to discuss the newest fad religion during his dinner hour, and they don't ask him to a supper at which chicken salad, iced creams and a punch that might be called a mystery constitute the menu. The truth is, the that, that came from an intelligence office. The first one to enter was a young woman in an large hat with pale blue feathers upon it; you noticed this first, and afterwards you became conscious of a pair of huge red hands, heavily beringed. Looking you saw a pair of miserable shoes with half the buttons off. This young person, when she heard there were only two in the family, said that it wouldn't be lively enough for her, but even after this, wanted to remain and have a little gossip. When it was impressed upon her mind that it was a cook that was wanted and not a conversationalist, she went out with her feathers waving in the air; and an expression of indignation on her face.

THE GIRL HAD A SWEETHEART.

The second applicant suggested that she had just come out of the penitentiary. She kept her eyes steadily on the floor; agreed to do everything; said she never wished to go out, and all that she wanted was the privilege of having her sweetheart come to see her at 10 o'clock, as he was in a business that would not permit his getting away any earlier. She was a little shy about her references, but eventually gave them. I went with my friend to look them up. We found that the people we were sent to had never even heard of her, and two days afterwards we saw her picture in the paper. She had gotten a situation the week before, had let her sweetheart in at the hour he wished to come, and he was good enough to bring with him two gentlemen friends. They took away all the silver, presumably to clean it, and the queen of the kitchen accompanied them with the intention undoubtedly, of overseeing the job. After this there was a stream of good and bad girls, of impudent and polite ones; that is to say, there was one polite one. And she was so very polite that we felt there must be something wrong with her. A pleasant inquiry to her elicited the fact that she was just out of the insane asylum. My friend is still without a cook, and I go and condole with her, and we both wonder why some of the kindly societies don't do something in the way of furnishing New York with servant girls instead of giving so much attention to the country. And then we ask each other a few questions.

SOME UNTRUTHFUL WOMEN.

Why will a woman write that a servant is a good, capable cook, when this knowledge of cooking consists of knowing how to fry a beefsteak and bake a roast?

Why will a woman give an undated reference to a servant?

Why will a woman say that Mary Jones is sober, honest and industrious, when she is discharging her for drunkenness, doesn't dare to tell Mary Jones the reason, but persuades Mary Jones into the belief that she is going to break up housekeeping! Men don't do this sort of thing with the people they employ. A bookkeeper has to be very certain of his ability before he can send his new to his old employer. I think it a queer little fear, a feminine bit of cowardice, that induces a woman to write down what she knows is not true. The servant girl question will never be settled until the police take it in hand. And by this I mean until each girl has a book in which she keeps the certificates of her character, and one older than three months will be counted worthless. Not until her history from the standpoint of honesty and good behavior is written out and put in a directory. Then, perhaps, one can believe in a reference. Just now I should doubt one sent to me by anybody unless it were signed

SEIZED BY ARABS.

A Tale of the Desert Full of Horror.

Hag Ahmet-el-Assal, a pilgrim lately returned from the Mecca pilgrimage, has been narrating the terrible experiences of his party to the editor of a native Egyptian paper, called the Mokattam. The pilgrim, whose respectability is vouched for by an Egyptian sheik who is greatly respected in Cairo, declares that on returning from Mecca the "Rafilat," or detachment of the caravan to which he belonged, and was composed of about 700 camels, left Bir-Said at daybreak and halted at sunset at the foot of a mountain, on the road to Yambo.

A few minutes after arriving there the Rafilat, composed of men, women and children, found themselves attacked by Bedouins of the desert, who attacked them with the utmost savagery, slaying and maiming the men of the party. The hot, dry sand was wet with blood. Some of the women, after being robbed of their clothes and valuables, were left to their fate; the younger and better-looking ones were carried off as slaves. With great difficulty the narrator of these facts escaped with his life.

THE FIELD OF HONOR.

Warriors Who Fought Duels for Various Purposes.

THE TRAGEDY OF DECATUR.

Dueling Feuds in European Armies—A French Swordsman, Jean Louis, Killed Thirteen Opponents.

ABOUT the only duel worthy of the name which took place during the civil war was fought in the lowlands of Arkansas, September, 1863, when the dashing Confederate cavalryman General Marmaduke shot down his brother soldier, General Lucius M. Walker. The conduct of General Walker during a movement of cavalry in defence of Little Rock led to a rupture between General Marmaduke and his chief. Wishing to be relieved from command under him, he asked that his division be attached to another corps. General Walker took offence and demanded an explanation, assuming that the course pursued by Marmaduke cast imputation upon his (Walker's) courage. Marmaduke said that he had never accused Walker of cowardice, but that he would not longer serve under him.

A challenge from Walker instantly followed. They met at 6 o'clock on the morning of Sept. 6th, on a farm seven miles below Little Rock. The weapons were all the barrels of which were loaded, and the distance 15 paces. Both fired the first shot simultaneously and without effect. At the second fire Walker fell, mortally wounded, and died the next day.

The killing of General William Nelson, of the Union army, by his brother soldier, General Jeff. C. Davis, was not done in a duel. There was a personal altercation in the lobby of the Gault House, Louisville, and Nelson slapped Davis' face in retort for a direct insult. Davis borrowed a pistol from a bystander, followed up his victim and shot him down in cold blood.

General Nathaniel Greene was twice challenged by one Captain Gunn. Greene refused to fight, and Washington sanctioned his course.

Perhaps the saddest duel in the service was that in which the famous Decatur lost his life, at the age of 41, after conquering the prairies of Barbary and receiving the thanks of all Europe and high honors at home. While acting as naval commissioner he made remarks censuring Commodore Barron. Barron challenged him. Decatur shot Barron in the hip, as he declared he would, but he himself received Barron's bullet in the abdomen and soon died.

In Europe, more particularly in France, military duels were of frequent occurrence. Early in the century between regiments and corps and between natives of different provinces often led to combats. So bitter was the feeling that often the closest friends, when drafted into different regiments between which the dueling feud existed, were compelled by an absurd code to fight as though they had been lifelong enemies.

In the cavalry regiment stationed at Marseilles, in 1796, the captain of one of the troops was a notorious bully. He took delight in torturing one of the youngest of his lieutenants, a bright young boy, and followed it up by slapping him and calling him a liar. The lieutenant had previously shown his courage in battle, and his comrades could not understand why he tolerated such insults, but he explained to them that he had conscientious scruples about dueling.

Finally the colonel of the regiment told him he must fight or leave. He agreed to fight on the condition that the duel should be with pistols over a handkerchief held between the combatants. One weapon was to be loaded and the other unloaded, and the choice was to be made by lot. The men stood up and when the captain pulled the trigger of the pistol he had chosen it proved to be the unloaded one. All eyes were of course fixed upon the boy to see what he would do under the circumstances. Many supposed that he would not shoot at all. But he by having that which has not come to a young girl—i. e., experience. Experience might be called the social sand paper. It is rubbed over one mentally until there are no sharp corners left, and one is made curiously unselfish, not from a particularly high motive, but because it is found that, if one wishes to be popular, one must consider other people first and one's self next. I don't believe this would make a book, but I think it is the truthful answer to the question.

There is nothing that delights my poor soul more than to hear a man talk about the fashions. He is by no means a bad critic, but having discovered one woman who dresses to suit him, he thinks every other one would look equally well in her clothes. Generalizing, he has a great fancy for blue in colors, and that some rosy-cheeked woman he knows can wear it and look well in it seems to him sufficient reason why all women should assume the color that makes those who are pale look paler, and those who are beginning to have wrinkles on their face look ten years older than they really are. In the summer time, he approves of white cotton frocks because he thinks they are simple; probably he would change his mind if he PAID A FEW LAUNDRY BILLS.

Just now he is quite happy because the fronts at the theatre are small, and as he gleefully approves of them, he wonders why they weren't put on years ago. He calls them a sensible fashion, whereas in truth they are absolutely ridiculous, for, leaving the top of the head entirely uncovered, they afford a lovely opportunity for the cold breezes to go through one's hair and gives one that most dire of complaints, neuralgia.

He has always said that he didn't like women to bleach their hair, and yet, when your hair begins to darken a little,

HE HAS THE IMPUDENCE

to wonder why you didn't stay a blonde as you were when he first fell in love with you. He is bitterly opposed to high heeled shoes, and yet some day when you show him a low shoe, very broad, and half a size too large for you, he agrees with you that it is very sensible, but denies ever having objected to a pretty shoe, and begs that if you are going to wear such dreadful looking things as that, that you will take a tuck out of your gown. He is fully impressed with the idea that women have tucks in their dresses and let them out or take them in as they may desire. He will assert that he knows a well-dressed woman when he sees her, and yet if he is asked to select one from among a number, he will choose her who wears, not a well-made frock, not an absolutely fashionable frock, but a frock the color of which pleases his eye. He has a decided liking for silk, and a vague idea that silk frocks last forever, and after your gown has come down to furnish linings and cover sofa pillows, he will wonder why you don't wear that pretty blue silk that he always liked. That you were the blue silk for five years, and that even if it were together now it would be out of fashion means nothing to him, and he says: "What if it is out of style? It was a pretty color, it was good silk, and it was ladylike." You might talk until your face was the color of the silk, but you would that he was wrong. There is one consolation in this, that if man does criticise, woman does not dress for his benefit. That is to say, she does and she doesn't. The general effect is for him; the means used to gain that effect are to be appreciated only by other women.

A society has been formed in New York for getting situations in the country for these servant girls who are willing to leave New York. Personally, if this country service would include a course of training with a whip, I for one would be very well satisfied. I have always maintained that the woman who could not keep her servants had something wrong in her make-up, but I am willing to take all of that back. A sitting of one afternoon with a friend, who wished to get a cook, convinced me that while the evil may exist in some mistresses, it doesn't in all. This lady and a most comfortable room, well carpeted, warm, and quite as well furnished as is the average room in a hotel. The maid she had for a long time was ill and had to go away, and she found the terrors, for they were dry and was wet with blood. Some of the women, after being robbed of their clothes and valuables, were left to their fate; the younger and better-looking ones were carried off as slaves. With great difficulty the narrator of these facts escaped with his life.

TUBERCULOSIS.

The activity of the New York State Board of Health in its campaign against tuberculosis is far from pleasing to the dairy interests. A Bill providing for compensation to owners at the rate of $80 for a healthy thoroughbred animal wrongfully killed and $40 in case it proves to be affected with tuberculosis is strongly opposed. The dairy men contend that it is unconstitutional and unjust to take a man's property without giving fair value therefor, and some thoroughbreds are worth $2,500 a head. They appeal to the State Senate arguing that the Board of Health used "Tuberculine," or Koch's lymph, to detect the disease, claiming that an injection developed it without fail where it existed. They claim that the lymph is not an infallible test, that inoculated cattle having tuberculosis do not always develop it, and that a physical test is the only certain guide. It is alleged that the Health authorities have ruined the dairy interests of the State. We shall have this question to deal with in Canada, and it is a good time to gain wisdom by the experience of others.

The Married Women Again.

Some actors have written books; a few actresses have aspired to authorship. I think a real live book about the domestic affairs of a popular actress who has been—well, say lightly harnessed to the matrimonial plough would be highly entertaining. But I hope she won't discourse on such a self-evident proposition as that which Miss Fannie Batchelder, Harrington's latest ingenue, has chosen—namely, "Why Men Like Married Women." All benedicts should like at least one married woman each, taking care that the particular one is the one named in his marriage certificate, and without feeling called upon to explain or apologize for his preference. Still, the reason why men like a woman who has been married from three to five times and is in training for another trial might require a two volume novel to explain. Some of the youthful and altogether charming Fannie's professional sisterhood could give valuable pointers on this. Now, if Fannie were a married woman and I were asked why I liked her I should unhesitatingly say it was because she is pretty and clever and attends strictly to her business and compels the men to attend to their business.

French Bread Laws.

The French baker is not only required to conform to laws regarding weight, but he is also told at what price he must sell his bread. He is further required to deposit a certain sum of money in the hands of the municipal authorities as a surety of good behavior. In the large fortified cities he has to keep a specified quantity of flour on hand to provide for warlike emergencies.

In Germany laws of similar import are in existence, and are enforced with such severity that no baker ever dreams of defying them.—Baker's Helper.

placing the muzzle of the pistol as near the captain's forehead as he could reach, owing to the distance separating them, and fired. Then, with exultation, he turned to those who were looking on and said, "Do you consider I have wiped out my insult?" He resigned at once, and thereafter there was no more bullying in the French cavalry service.

But the most praiseworthy and heroic episode of the army dueling field was that when the world famous master-at-arms, Jean Louis, slew one after another, with his good damascene, thirteen Italian swordsmen, who, reckless of their inevitable doom, came to the scratch in defense of feud dueling. Jean Louis' feat deserves immortality. It is scarcely known in history. The following is substantially the account preserved in the war archives at Paris, as cited by Eugene Van Schaick in "Lippincott's Magazine" for January, 1893:

Jean Louis was one of the masters and originators of

THE ART OF FENCING.

During the French occupancy of Spain, under Napoleon, in 1813 Louis was master-at-arms of the Thirty-Second French Infantry. The First Regiment of Infantry in the same army and the same camp was composed almost solely of Italians. The dueling feuds before spoken of and the rivalries of nationalities gave rise to many quarrels, when swords would be immediately drawn and bullets exchanged in deadly combat.

Many severe battles took place, some of them in the streets of Madrid, and at times a hundred or more friendly Italian and French soldiers took part. The evil became so great that the colonels of the two regiments determined to put a stop to it, and they decreed that the masters-at-arms of the First and Thirty-second—30 in all, 15 on a side—should fight it out. Soldiers to the number of 10,000 were arrayed on the plains around Madrid, and in the centre of the concourse a ring was left open for the stage of the duel. Every soldier and every officer could witness

THE DETAILS OF THE FIGHT.

At the sound of the drum two men in fencing habit entered the ring. One was Ferrari, a celebrated Italian swordsman. He was tall, strong and handsome, and was opposed by one equally tall, strong and handsome—Jean Louis. The seconds took their places, a silence ensued, and "On guard!" was called. The men cut the daylight crossed swords Ferrari lunged savagely at his opponent, but Louis met every thrust by a parry, at the same time caressing and tossing the Italian's blade.

Suddenly the Italian jumped aside and made a terrible lunge at Louis, but again with great rapidity Louis parried and pierced the Italian in the shoulder. "It is a mere scratch," cried Ferrari and fell back on guard. Then Jean Louis attacked and thrust his blade into his opponent's breast. The Italian's sword dropped from his hand. He

FELL ON THE TURF, DEAD,

Jean Louis immediately returned to his position, wiping his sword and looking around for the next comer. Fourteen Italian swordsmen stood ready to avenge the death of the best fencer of the First Regiment.

After a couple of minutes' rest the adversaries were again in place. There was a click of swords, a swift flashing and returning of blades, and another Italian lay dead in the ring. The third advanced, but Jean Louis' friends advised him to rest. He smiled at the suggestion, and the men took their places. The new-comer expected to be able to avoid these feints and tricks of the Frenchman that had lost the day to his comrades. He opened with a terrible thrust, which Jean parried, putting his own blade into the Italian's breast, and so on to the end.

One after another 10 more fell. There were but two left. The colonel of one of the regiments requested Louis to suspend combat. He finally did so and shook hands with the two survivors, applauded by the whole army. From that time fights were less frequent between the Italian and French soldiers of Napoleon's army.

At present, in the American military and naval service, an officer implicated in a duel, or principal or second in one, is liable to be cashiered. The British rules are equally severe.

HOW TO FOSTER LOVE.

The Old Saw Says "Absence Makes the Heart Grow Fonder."

IN THAT LIES THE SECRET.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox Advises Wives and Mothers to Leave Their Dear Ones for a Month or Two Each Year, and All, She Thinks, Will be Happier in the End.

Once upon a time I heard a girl say, who had never had a home and who, therefore, longed for it as only the homeless can: "If I ever marry I will never stir an hour's distance from my home, nor will I let my husband be 10 minutes out of my sight while we both live."

"Then, my dear girl, you will certainly bring up in the divorce court,' I replied. "Incompatibility will be the plea. You had far better make a firm resolve to absent yourself twice a year for a month or six weeks—not longer. That will add to your value in your home circle, and render you more interesting and interested."

The romantic young lady, of course, was not converted to my views, but a careful observation of the world would compel her to be.

Were a law passed enforcing the absence of mothers from their children and wives from their husbands at least twice every year for a limited period of time, a score of homes which are but homes in name to-day, because of the existence of discord and discontent in their midst, would become havens of peace and happiness.

One of the most devoted mothers I ever knew prided herself upon never having passed a night away from home during a period of fifteen years. But the husband and the children of this woman failed to appreciate her sacrifice, regarding it rather as a natural duty on her part—while the woman became irritable and notional in her ideas of life, and found it impossible to keep pace with the progress of the world. Her husband and children mixed with the public to greater or less extent, while she, like a horse in a treadmill, went her weary round, and called it "doing her duty." There is no such thing as doing your duty to others if you neglect a duty to self.

Had this woman taken a month of recreation twice a year, entirely apart from the members of her family, she would have accentuated her value in their eyes, and given herself new food for thought, new appreciation for the ties and duties from which she was temporarily separated. But neither mother, wife, husband nor father should prolong these absences beyond a certain limit.

The fondest, truest and most devoted hearts in the world are liable to conform to habit, and to adapt themselves to existing circumstances after the first loneliness and wrench of separation from loved objects has passed away into philosophical calm.

Then follows the reaching out after new pleasures and interests, and the formation of new habits, dangerous to the peace of the old life.

The woman who goes jaunting about the world for pleasure during three or four months of the year, leaving husband and children to their own devices, is not making her value felt at home. Instead, she is teaching her family how to enjoy life without her, and it is very possible that both husband and children may find her a bar to many pleasures when she returns. It is not that the love for mother and wife dies out in these few months, but that new habits of life are formed during such a protracted absence, which interfere with a later return to the old system. It is one of the greatest mistakes possible in life to allow one we love to learn how to get along without us; and this is exactly what happens when a protracted separation of months take place.

Meanwhile the limited absence of a few weeks feeds the heart with new fuel, and gives each the opportunity to miss the other's virtues and condone each other's faults.

If we hold an object too near the eyes, the sight is blurred—we cannot see its beauties. If we hold it just far enough we see it distinctly. Too far, we do not see it at all. It is just so with those we love. The uninterrupted association blurs our vision—the occasional absence renders them clear and bright to our sight—the long separation hides them from view.

There is no love, no tie, so perfect that is not marred to some degree by the first, strengthened and purified by the second, and endangered by the third.

CANDY MAKING AT HOME.

Pure Sweets May be Easily Compounded by These Rules.

DROPS, KISSES, CARAMELS, CREAMS.

A children's candy party need not be a serious matter or an expensive one, if common-sense and good recipes are provided in sufficient abundance. Saturday afternoon is a good time for it, and be prepared before hand. Confectioner's sugar is the best to use in making the sweets.

Christmas drops, the pretty name an old English friend gives a pretty confection, is a good candy to begin with. Beat the white of one egg and a quarter of a pound of sugar until smooth, adding gradually a half teaspoonful of cream of tartar and soda sifted together; flavor to taste with lemon juice and grate in a very little of the rind. Drop on buttered tins about three inches apart and bake in a slow oven until a light golden brown; remove with a broad, thin knife blade and set aside to cool.

The dainty little confections known as kisses are favorites. Here is an easy way to make them:

Beat the white of six eggs to a froth, but not stiff; add a half-pound of sugar, and stir until the mixture grows very stiff; drop a spoonful a few inches apart on buttered paper laid upon baking tins; sift fine sugar lightly over them and slip into a very quick oven to turn a pale cream and grow firm; they must not brown. Run a thin flexible blade—a palette knife is just right—under each little hemisphere and lift from the paper; scoop out the soft centre, then let the kisses lie a moment in the mouth of the oven to dry; fill with whipped cream and put the two dry sides together.

Be sure the nuts are fresh and prepare a generous supply. You must have Brazil nuts, pecans, hickory nuts and almonds, and also some walnut meats. Chop them all, but not fine enough to make them oily. Strew them as thick as possible on a shallow tin pan that has been well greased with some sweet butter; mix in with the meats some candied orange and lemon peel and half a dozen finely-chopped stoned dates. Boil your syrup, made of two pounds of sugar and a cup of water, until a drop hardens in cold water. A teaspoonful of strained lemon juice and then pour over the nuts; mark into squares while soft and let it cool before taking from the pan.

Chocolate caramels are usually much favored by those who like chocolate at all. To make delicious ones use molasses. Take a cupful for two cups of grated chocolate and two cups of sweet cream; mix the molasses and chocolate to a smooth paste with half the cream, and boil half an hour, adding one cup of brown sugar and one of white powdered, a teaspoonful of flour and vanilla essence to taste. Pour the mixture into buttered, flat pans, and mark, when nearly cold, into small squares. Transparent caramels are made of the clear syrup, boiled until it hardens in cold water, flavored with lemon, vanilla, almond or rose essence; if the last flavor is used add a little cochineal and the squares are delicately tinted when cold.

Cream candies are easily made, some without cooking at all; these are the soft balls intended for nuts to be covered with melted chocolate. The nuts for these must be carefully cracked, as each half should be perfect. An excellent proportion for the cream is to boil together two pounds of sugar and a teacupful of water until it threads, flavor with vanilla, take the saucepan from the fire and stir until the syrup becomes creamy. Then roll it into balls and press half a walnut kernel into each side, roll in granulated sugar and set aside to cool. These little balls are also dipped into melted chocolate, and become the chocolate creams.

Everybody likes marshmallows. The paste is really gum arabic. Dissolve six ounces of the gum cubes into a little boiling water; about a teacupful is enough; strain and add a pound and a quarter of sugar; put into a bain-marie and stir over the fire until stiff; then take from the fire and stir for at least three or four minutes, and then set aside to cool. Beat together the white of one egg and a tablespoonful of cold water; flavor with a tablespoonful of vanilla essence; beat until frothy; then add sugar to make a stiff paste. Now set over the fire in boiling water and when it is liquid enough, dip almond-sized pieces of the marshmallow paste with the cream; turn with a fork until fully covered, and lift on to buttered paper.

For almond candy, make a syrup by putting the white of an egg unbeaten into a

A MUSTARD PLASTER.

Sad Experience of a Man Who Applied One to Himself.

IT STOPPED THE PAIN.

He came home with a pain in his back. He was suffering terribly; pains were racking his spinal column of a nature far more severe than had ever been suffered by mortal man before—he admitted it himself.

"Make me a mustard plaster, Mary, and make it good and strong," he wailed, as he threw himself upon the sofa.

In a few minutes the patient little wife came in with a plaster about the size of an ordinary sheepskin saddle—good and thick, too. He took it into his sleeping room and said he'd put it on himself.

"Why, dear, you can't put it on your back yourself; let me fix it for you," and she started to follow him in.

"Never you mind, now, I'll attend to this," he growled, "you go on with your work, and see to it that you are not bothered. This pain is killing me by inches, and he shut the door.

Well, he undressed, picked up the plaster from the dresser and tried to get it on—and there was a circus that came near to equalling "the greatest show on earth." He tried to reach back with his hand and lay it on his back, but only succeeded in getting it on his side, while a pint or so of the mustard trickled onto the floor and down into his clothes. It didn't feel good, and he got mad. He pulled it off and tried it with the other hand, but got the same result. Then he pinned it on the wall and tried to back up against it, and ran three pins into his hide. As a last resort, he spread the plaster on the floor and then lay down and tried to press it on, but miscalculated the distance and got his head in it. As he raised up, with his hair looking like a guinea pig, he on the whole greatly resembled a Zulu dressed for a ball.

His "talk" during the performance had been getting more and more emphatic, and at last brought his wife in. She prevailed upon him to allow her to arrange the plaster, and after wiping him off she was told to not take it off his back, no matter how much he howled with the burning, for he was determined that he would kill that pain. She promised, and, by his instructions, locked the door upon him. He was alone with the plaster.

For a half hour she heard nothing excepting a rattling of the bed springs, as he tossed about—then she heard him walking the floor—then ravings and grumblings with an occasional stamp on the floor—then a short and decisive yelp. She smiled. "I guess that will be enough if he leaves it on—I'll let it stay as he wanted me to so he won't be grunting around with his back for a week. I had one experience like that with him"—a prolonged growl interrupted her and she heard the crash of falling china. "Mary, unlock that door and come in here and take this lava bed off of me; I'm no hog; I know when I've got enough." She was just going over to a neighbor's to get a little coffee for supper, and thought she'd wait till she got back.

As she stepped into the house 10 minutes later blows of the heavy boots were threatening to break in the door, while howls and screeches and roars came from within that room. "Open that door or I'll break it in and turn in the fire alarm," he yelled. "This outrage means a divorce, and you might as well make up your mind to it." There was a final struggle, a ripping and tearing, and as she got the door open she saw that she was too late. Sticking up against the mirror was a dark and foggy mass, while her lord was doing his best to get his book down into the wash bowl. Of course it was upset, and the flood of water added to the ruin. He put on his clothes, and as he stamped out of the house, stopped to hiss between his teeth: "You'll pay dearly for this, madame; mark my words," and he was gone.

That night he came in about 8 o'clock with his arms filled with fruit and confections. "That plaster stopped the pain, dear," was all he said.

For the Sudden Toothache.

Toothache is a little thing in the books, but many physicians would rather meet a burglar at the door on a dark night than a call to cure a bad toothache of several days' continuance. A hypodermic of morphine only postpones the evil day, and usually the patient is respectfully referred to the dentist. The teeth should not be extracted while the nerve and gums are inflamed and the latter swollen, and it is the physician's duty to treat the case until the above conditions are removed. Always keep a small

NEW SPRING STYLES.

Some of the Dainty Novelties Worn in London.

EVERYTHING GREEN AND MAUVE.

Model of the Latest Thing in Petticoats—Lace and Guipures Trim All Gowns—Striking Effects in Hats, Toques and Bonnets—Smart Cut of the Spring Cape—Ball Gowns for Young Girls.

LONDON, February.—The novelty of spring toilets consists less in their actual shape and cut, which differs but little from those of the winter, than in their style of arrangement and trimming. There are combinations of material which are in themselves quite a poem. Miroir velvet, so soft and light that it can be used for the most loosely-flowing draperies, and even for the graceful Marie Antoinette fichu, is one of the most exquisite factors in the harmony of a becoming toilet. In evening toilets, it is combined with the most transparent aerial tissues, the most filmsy gauzes, tulles and silk muslins.

All lace borders and insertion, from a costly point lace to fancy colored guipures, are profusely used. But the novelty consists in combining lace with other things, such as velvet ribbons, or a jet galloon, for jet is more appreciated than ever; not only are mantles all ablaze with it, but it is showered over fine open-worked galloons, lace insertion and also on bands of tulle and grenadine. For young girls' evening dresses all these trimmings are most suitable. Embroidered insertion in beads is more novel than frills or ruches round bell-shaped skirts of nuns' veiling or crepon for evening gowns. A very dainty evening dress for a young girl is of white silk gauze over pale green silk. The low bodice is trimmed with drooping loops of rose-colored pearls, mixed with tinted crystal beads, which are fastened upon the chest and on the shoulders by beautiful dragon-flies in the same roseate and pale green and amber tints. A sort of tunic draped over the skirt is also caught up here and there with loops of rose-colored pearls and tinted crystal beads; the under skirt is trimmed round the foot with double ruches, divided by strings of beads. The effect is very pretty, the colors being all very soft and light.

A BRACE OF FETCHING BALL GOWNS.

Another ball dress is of turquoise blue silk draped with mousseline de soie, the sleeves are of the 1830 period in silk muslin accordion pleated with blush roses tacked here and there. The skirt is five and a half yards wide, cut walking length, made of satin, veiled with the fleecy material and trimmed at the hem and above the knee with wide bead insertion composed of jet and turquoises. Another gown of a more matronly type is composed of black velvet, the skirt being slightly drapedin front, half trained; the belt and lower part of the sleeves are richly embroidered in jet; the bodice cut square and low is trimmed with a handsome vandyke collar of Venetian point.

HATS AND BONNETS FOR SPRING WEAR.

Hats are both large and small, but, if anything, the taste of the moment inclines to the latter. The boat hat is very becoming to many faces, which would be tried considerably by the "picture" size. A very becoming hat of moderate size has the brim in forget-me-not blue moire, with brown straw crown and a border of beaver. The inevitable violets are represented by two large bunches at the back. Certain rich satin ribbons of fancy coloring and design are now adapted to make up into the loveliest bows for hats and bonnets, and, provided the witch will permit, they can be twisted and felted into the most telling little toques, which a touch of feather trimming or jet passementerie or a wired bow of lace will complete. Gold embroidery is as fashionable as ever for the crown of bonnets, and flowers will again constitute a good half of those worn in the spring.

Another fashionable headgear is a bonnet made in the shape of a regular Mercury's cap in gold sequins, with black jet wings at either side and little bunches of violets at the back.

HARMONY IN GREEN PEA VIGOGNE.

There is no love, no life, so perfect that it is not marred to some degree by the first, strengthened and purified by the second, and endangered by the third.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

A Music Rack.

An ordinary camp stool may be utilized for a pretty and unique music receptacle. Remove the canvas seat, and in its place tack two-thirds of a yard of Brussels carpet-border with the wrong side up. Line it with a yard of some dainty-colored China silk, finishing the overhanging ends with brass rings. The silk is wide enough to lie with a slight fulness, and should be sewed fast, with a few invisible stitches, to the carpet where the latter is tacked on to the frame. The rack is held in position by brass chains fastened with large brass-headed tacks. The chains should hang down an even length with the silk lining, a ring being fastened to each of the four ends.

Cooking by Steam.

Cooking dishes are now made in England, in which in the boiling process the meat does not come in contact with the water or steam. The edible is contained in a jacket, which in turn is immersed in the outside kettle containing the boiling water. It is claimed that by this the nutritious qualities of meat are preserved, nothing passing off in vapor. There is moisture enough in the meat to prevent it from burning and all the flavor is retained, while, again, the fiber retains a tenderness not found in any other method.—Hardware.

He Mispronounced It.

The Housekeeper's Weekly tells how a boy was led astray by a misunderstood title.

He was about 8 years old, and was looking over the book-shelves for something to read. A volume bound in red attracted him. It was Pope's "Essay on Man."

He read it for a few minutes, and then threw it down.

"It may be easy on man," he said, "but it's hard on a boy."

Was a Real Boy, Too.

"Mamma, may I have a cup of real tea, not just make-believe sambric tea?"

"No, Stuart; my little boy is not old enough to drink real tea."

"Well, I don't see why. You just let me eat a piece of real cake."

How They Get Rich.

"This is a fearfully slow road," said Hawley to the conductor of the western train.

"Oh, no," said the conductor. "We go a mile in twenty minutes. If we went faster we couldn't pay dividends. We charge travelers by the hour."

Jimmy on George Washington.

"Who can tell me who George Washington was?" asked a teacher in a primary school. A number of little hands waved eagerly. "Well, Jimmy, you may tell me," said the teacher. "He was the first prisoner of the United States," answered Jimmy, proudly.

Score One for the Newspaper.

The women are always grateful when a newspaper contains something that interests their husbands for a considerable length of time. It takes their minds off the fact that breakfast is not ready on time.

If a well could be dug to a depth of 46 miles, the air at the bottom would be as dense as quicksilver.

"Something to eat!"—"Something to eat!"
Hark to the wail of the poor in the street!
Hear them implore help at your door!
List to the pathos with which they entreat
"Give us a bite!"—or, "Our lodging for night!"
"Something to do!"—"Something to eat!"

The boy halted in front of the blacksmith shop, when the proprietor queried: "You are sure your father told you to get the old mare shod, are you?" And the boy said sheer.

"Rest and change are good for people," said the wife as she rose in the night to rifle her husband's pockets. "I've had a rest, and now I think I'll have some change."—Buffalo Courier.

A NEW VERSION.

Woman is formed with such bewitching mien
That to be loved she needs but to be seen;
But seen too oft and of her love too sure
We first embrace, then pity, then endure.

On Chicago Day over 45,000 individuals passed into the World's Fair on deadhead tickets. This is something more than the population of the State that Senators Stewart and Jones represent in the Senate. Did the Paris Exposition beat that?

The softest of snaps is the click of a well-to make a stiff paste. Now boil over the fire in boiling water and when it is liquid enough, dip almond-sized pieces of the marshmallow paste with the cream; turn with a fork until fully covered, and lift on to buttered paper.

For almond candy, make a syrup by putting the white of an egg, unbeaten, into a half pint of water in which you have dissolved a pound of sugar; let this stand ten minutes, then put it to boil, and skim it well; boil again until quite thick; put into it a pound of blanched almonds, stir and pour the mixture on buttered plates.

Cement Pavements.

About two years ago a pavement made with Buckeye Portland cement was laid on one of the main streets of Bellefontaine, O., which has worn so well that other streets have since then been paved in the same manner. The method of construction was as follows: The subgrade was first formed and well rolled to a good surface 6 inches below the grade line, a 4-inch tile drain, with tarred paper at the joints, being laid just inside each curb. The lower course of pavement was 4 inches thick and formed of 1 part of Buckeye Portland cement to 4 parts of clean gravel and sand mixed in the proportion of 2 parts of gravel to 1 part of sand. These materials were mixed by machine, with enough water to show on the surface when well rammed. The 2-inch top course was mixed of equal parts of cement and clean sand or crushed granite and was laid like the bottom course. A very thin layer of this top was first rubbed into the surface of the bottom course to insure adhesion. The entire pavement was separated into regular blocks about five feet square, and the surface was broken in continuous lines from end to end and side to side at intervals of four inches by V-shaped grooves one inch wide and three-sixteenths of an inch deep. The blocks laid over pipes were given joints sloping in such a manner that each block could be raised without disturbing any other. The curbs used with these pavements are composed of one part of the same kind of cement and three parts of sand and are raised above, but form part of the blocks on each side of the pavement proper. The contractor guaranteed to keep this pavement in good order for five years. The materials required per square yard were 144 pounds of cement and four cubic feet of gravel.—Engineering Record.

A Herd of Cattleo.

William Weaver, of Darbie, N. D., has arrived here with a number of "cattleo," which he will exhibit at the Midwinter Fair. These animals are the progeny of a buffalo and a polled Angus cow. The cross gives an animal larger than the buffalo, and the skins are much superior to those of the full-blood buffalo, the fur being finer and longer and of the uniform seal-brown color. They are worth from $100 to $150 apiece, but one skin was so fine that he got $250 for it. The meat is at least 50 per cent. finer than buffalo, too, partaking of the native wildness of that animal and the high blood of the polled cattleo.—San Francisco Bulletin.

One Angel's Busy Hour.

St. Peter—How beautifully these angels float in that orange-tinted cloud out yonder!

Recording angel—Yes, yes; but don't interrupt me please! I'm terribly busy. Millions of the most terrible cuss words coming in every second.

St. Peter—What? Why, this is early Sunday morning, and nearly all the people of earth, wearied with the week's work, are asleep.

Recording angel—They were asleep but the church bells have begun to ring.

Mistress and Maid.

"Marie, has anyone called while I have been out?"

"Yes, ma'am: Mr. Pommier."

"Mr. Pommier? I don't know anyone of that name."

"I know that, ma'am; it was me he came to see!"

Not Bullet Proof.

The much vaunted "bullet-proof cloth," with which the German army was to have been equipped, has been rejected by the German military authorities for several reasons—among others, that it is not bullet-proof.

How Was It, Indeed?

Peter—If you go over there where the ice is thin, you'll get drowned.

Little Johnnie—If that's so, pa, how was it that the man who put up the danger sign didn't fall in?

Last year the States built 1,958 locomo-only postpones the evil day, and usually the patient is respectfully referred to the dentist. The teeth should not be extracted while the jaw and gums are inflamed and the latter swollen, and it is the physician's duty to treat the case until the above conditions are removed. Always keep a small phial containing the following mixture: Chloroform, 10 drops; glycerine, 10 drops; sat. sol. sc. carbol, 10 drops; morphine, 1 grain, with a small wad of absorbent cotton. If the offending tooth has a cavity or decayed surface, saturate a small pellet of cotton with the above mixture and put into the cavity or against the decayed surface, as the case may be. Never pack the cotton in or the more is the trouble, but have the pellet small enough to enter without crowding. In most cases this will end the trouble.

When the gums are swollen and tender, paint two or three times, two minutes apart, with a 4 per cent. solution of cocaine. The patient may have been eating a good deal of fruit. The tongue and mucous membrane of the mouth are pale, he has a sour stomach, and next day the toothache will return. Give 5 grains of subcarbonate of bismuth and 5 grains of phenacetin at once and a smaller dose before each of the three following meals, with a laxative, if needed, and stop all fruit for a few days, and it will not return. The same powder every four hours, with cessation of fruit eating, will stop the persistent, tormenting neuralgias so prevalent in the fruit season.

Remarks on Eggs.

Eggs may lose their nourishment by cooking. The yolk raw or very slightly boiled is exceedingly nutritious. It is, moreover, the only food for those afflicted with jaundice. When an egg has been exposed to a long continuance of culinary heat, its nature is entirely changed. A slightly boiled egg, however, is more easy of digestion than a raw one. The best accompaniment for a hard egg is vinegar. Raw eggs have a laxative effect; hard boiled the contrary. There is an idiosyncrasy in some persons which shows itself in the utter disgust which they experience not only against the egg itself, but also against any preparation of which it forms an ingredient, however slight. Eggs should always be liberally accompanied by bread, says Table Traits.

Red Lead as an Iron Preservative.

There has been a very general impression that red lead paint was the best preservative for iron, though red lead is a highly oxidizing substance and theoretically should not be as good a preservative as many other paints, says the Railroad Gazette. Mr. W. Thompson, in a paper read before the Manchester Association of Engineers, states that he finds that red lead has the effect of producing a skin of the unoxidized black or magnetic oxide on the iron itself, thus protecting it against further oxidation. Further experiments showed that other oxidizing agents, such as manganese dioxide, form a paint which also protects structural iron from rusting.

Pretty Pillow Covers.

Pretty pillow covers are made of the silk and gold embroidered doylies, which can now be purchased very cheap from any of the art stores. Make a pillow out of any pretty plain material—China silk is desirable—and sew on the squares. Five on the first row, four on the next, and so on until you have one for the last row. A narrow gold embroidery will make a good finish for the edges.

A Good Definition.

Aunt (to little Oscar)—What dress had your mother on when she drove off to the party this evening?

Oscar—A long, white, short dress.

Aunt—Nonsense, it could not be long and short at the same time.

Oscar—Yes, aunty. It was long at the bottom and short at the top.—Mannheimer Volksblatt.

An Abnormal Squint.

The other day T—— saw a friend of his sitting at lunch in a restaurant and reading his paper at the same time.

"Why, how on earth can you manage to eat and read at the same time?"

"Pesh! I read with one eye and I eat with the other."

His Awful Threat.

"Since you reject me," wildly exclaimed the infatuated youth, "there is nothing for me to do but to promptly put an end to my miserable existence."

"'Promptly to put an end to my miserable existence,' if you will allow me to correct you, Mr. Tankersley," replied the Boston young woman, pale with horror, good deal of those worn in the spring.

Another fashionable headgear is a bonnet made in the shape of a regular Mercury's cap in gold sequins, with black jet wings at either side and little bunches of violets at the back.

HARMONY IN GREEN PEA VIGOGNE.

An exceedingly striking walking costume is made of vigogne in the shade known as petits pois. This material is used for the bodice and for the long draperies of the skirt, the latter being arranged in such a way to show a petticoat of mireir moire in a rich shade of Havana brown. The tight-fitting gauntlets of the sleeves are also made of this beautiful moire. The elaborate embroideries on the collar and bodice as well as on the basque and the draperies are carried out in fine silk cord, worked in rich oriental colorings, and outlining a band of appliqué Indian embroidery, which is carried round the basque and draperies. With this gown a bonnet of Havana velvet is worn, daintily bordered with oriental embroidery, and smartly caught up on one side with a plume of feathers arranged to match the embroidery.

ANOTHER OF LEAF GREEN TINT.

Another gown which is delightful for this season of the year is made in cloth of a lovely shade of leaf-green. The skirt is perfectly plain, while the bodice which buttons down the back is most artistically arranged with a square yoke of darker green velvet and bands of cloth, hand-embroidered, with a floral scroll design in shaded silks. Below this yoke the full folds of cloth are drawn down under a band covered with similar embroidery. At the back, in place of a square trimming, there is a pointed yoke formed partly of dark green velvet and partly of bands of embroidery. The full sleeves are turned back at the wrist to show a lining of dark green velvet.

SMART SOCIETY PELISSE.

When it is too warm to appear in heavy winter wraps and yet too cold for spring coats and mantles a smart pelisse is the one thing to wear. The latest production in that way is a handsome brooche made in deep Mediterranean-blue cloth with a tight-fitting Zouave bodice of cerulean-blue velvet in a deeper shade. The bodice is beautifully moulded to the figure and is arranged with smart revers in front covered with an elaborate design of hand-embroidery in fine jet upon the blue velvet. These revers are turned back to show a vest covered with the newest kind of cream guipure lace. The sleeves are of blue cloth sloping away from the shoulders and surmounted there by deep epaulettes of velvet, cut in vandyke points and edged throughout with a narrow bordering of jet.

NEW TONY SPRING CAPE.

Some charming capes most suitable for early spring wear, also for driving or travelling, are made in tweed of fine quality. These tweeds are reversible and are to be obtained in many colors, one of the prettiest having one side in oak brown and the other in small red and dark blue check. In fact plaids of all descriptions are used for these capes. These new wraps are long and are made with very full shoulder capes and deep turn down collars. They are very smart and can be thrown open to any width without falling from the shoulders.

Everybody Happy

A funeral director was heard to express his gratification over a recent piece of work in his line in this manner:

"Yes, the corpse was laid out lovely, the pallbearers' gloves were a perfect fit, the hearse was tip-top in style, the carriages were new and clean, the horses were well groomed, the drivers were neat as could be, and I tell you the mourners were mightily pleased."

Artistic!

"Were the pictures in the art gallery appropriately grouped?"

"Yes. A Mahonna with hair of the color that Titian loved was hung next to 'White Heroes,' by Rosa Bonheur."

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

TAMWORTH.

We have again to announce two sudden deaths in our midst, the one a daughter of Mrs. Timothy Mahoney, who died Friday with consumption. The other Mr. Daniel York, who had reached the ripe old age of seventy four years and was hearty until a few days before he died. The funeral of Mrs. Mahoney's daughter was on Sunday at Erinsville R. C. Church, she was placed in the vault there. Mr. York's funeral took place on Tuesday at the Methodist church, he was placed in the vault here.

The Church Woman's Guild will be held at Mrs. James Shield's, at two o'clock, next Wednesday.

A social was held at Mr. Geo. Blacks, north east of this place, under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid, of the Methodist church. A large number from here went. They had a full house and a good time. Proceeds not known.

The congregation of the Presbyterian church intend to hold a reception at the Manse on Thursday eve.

Mr. Hinch has taken a position at Robinson & Co., of Napanee.

Mr. and Mrs. F. Hinch, of Hinch Neighborhood, made a call on Mr. G. S. Hinch last Monday.

Services held through Lent each Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock, and Friday afternoons at 4 o'clock.

WILTON.

Mrs. Lester Babcock, who has been quite ill, is getting better.

Miss Anna Forsyth has returned from Harrowsmith.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Timmerman, Seneca Falls, are visiting friends and relatives in Wilton and vicinity. As Mr. Timmerman left Wilton thirty-nine years ago he must notice quite a change in the place.

Damon Asselstine and family have moved to Fairfield.

Robert Miller and wife drove to Portland, Saturday, returning Monday. While they were gone one of their horses, which was left in Harrowsmith, ran away and was hurt quite badly.

Alexander Stuart, one of our oldest and most respected residents passed away Sunday morning at the ripe old age of seventy-six. Mr. Stuart has not been well for four or five months, but had never kept his bed, so that his sudden death was a great shock to the family. He leaves a wife and eight children, five of whom reside in the United States. The funeral services were held at the Methodist church, Wednesday morning.

On Tuesday morning, Wilson Snider died at the residence of his son Alva Snider. The funeral was held Friday.

John B. Snider, Murvale, has moved in James Thompson's house, Lake Street.

N. A. Asselstine has purchased the Hamilton farm.

C. Stover is in Toronto as delegate to the Grand Council of the Chosen Friends.

MOSCOW.

Evidences of the near approach of spring are to be seen on every hand, but perhaps the most obvious sign is the "small boy and his marbles."

Some of our people have commenced to tap the maples, in a short time the sugar social campaign will commence; boys be ready.

Two of our young ladies have a bad habit of deceiving people, boys beware.

Now Mr. Editor please forgive me for taking up so much space in your paper and I will close. Good-bye.—Farmer's Son.

NEWBURGH.

Our streets are almost clear of snow making it very inconvenient for sleighs to get about.

Business rather quiet.

Mr. E. W. Stickney is in Toronto this week looking for machinery to replace his manufacturing business. We hope he will decide to rebuild again.

Miss Davidson, of Kingston, was the guest of Miss Brisco on Saturday and Sunday last.

Daughters of Zion Mission Band will give a grand entertainment on Friday evening, March 29th.

Professor Brown will be here on April 3rd. in behalf of the Institute.

PINE GROVE.

Mrs. and Mrs. Titus Wagar have removed to their new home near Lonsdale.

Mr. Victor Wagar has returned home from the States after an absence of over two years.

Mrs. William Mellow, of Deseronto, has been visiting friends here.

Several of our young people attended the parties at Mr. Wm. Millers and Mr. Murney Parks', on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and report a splendid time.

Miss Amelia Wagar returned home on Sunday last, after a few days visit with friends at Hay Bay.

Miss Hattie Fields spent a few days last week with friends at Moscow.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Wagar, of Enterprise, and Mr. and Mrs. Jake Wagar of Tamworth, spent a few days with friends here.

PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY.

Ethan Ungar and sister Maude, of Selby, are this week visiting relatives in this county.

The ice is said to be in a fine condition at present.

Miss Nellie Dodge, Milford, is visiting friends at Odessa.

Mrs. Eshe Smith, Napanee Road, is spending a week with relatives in Yerexville.

A suicidal wave appears to have swept over our fair county of late. No less than five deaths by suicide in about a year's time.

A. Tubbs, Yerexville, and John C. Benson of Benson's, were the guests of Benson Moore, Napanee, Saturday and Sunday last.

The farmers of this county are beginning to consider the "home market" as inadequate. They are selling their butter on an average of sixteen cents per pound, many are still holding their last season's grain, and their hops are worth considerably less than nothing to them—a minus quantity in fact.

CENTREVILLE WEST.

AUCTION SALE OF VALUABLE FARM PROPERTY.

Under and by virtue of the power of sale contained in a Mortgage made by Annie Bartels (now Annie Alder) to the vendor, which said Mortgage will be produced at the time of sale, there will be offered for sale by Public Auction, at the Court House, in the town of Napanee, on Tuesday, 16th day of April

A. D., 1895, at one o'clock in the afternoon, the following valuable property namely: All and singular that certain parcel or tract of land and premises, situate, lying and being in the township of Ernestown, in the county of Lennox and Addington, and Province of Ontario, being composed of lot No. 4, in the fourth concession of the said Township of Ernestown, containing three and one half acres, bounded on the north by the Macadamized Road, on the east by the Public Road between lots four and five in the said fourth concession and being that parcel of said lot previous to her decease occupied by the late Margaret F. Vrooman.

Upon the said property is said to be the following improvements: a large brick dwelling house and a large frame barn, sheds and stables.

The property is beautifully located at the corner near the White Church at Morven. The land consisting of 3½ acres is the very finest of soil. The property is very desirable for a market garden.

Terms and conditions of sale made known at the time of sale.

For further particulars apply to THOS. E. ANDERSON, No. 6, Johnston, Napanee, or to

JOHN ENGLISH,
Vendor's Solicitor.

Dated at Napanee this 21st day of Mar. 1895.

Here and there all along the pavement little knots are busily engaged in this absorbing game, but one fellow says he has an "Allie" that wins every time.

Misses Lucas and Baker canvassed Huffman St. on Tuesday, in aid of the missionaries.

The church guil seems to be the theme that absorbs the minds of three or four of our young ladies, judging from the way they tackle every person possessing a name, and they have such a peculiar way of putting it that before you are aware of it you are made to feel as though you were under a wonderful obligation to the sweet creatures and hand out your dime, inwardly wishing you had a dozen names.

A little girl and boy have come to brighten the homes of Mr. J. Patterson and E. Vanluven.

Mr. Bartell is suffering from a severe attack of pneumonia.

Mr. Arch. Huffman spent Sunday in Napanee.

I wonder where Mr. Lochead's head was when his horse broke it's leg Sunday night, we expect you to leave your heart Jimmie, but please take your head with you.

Miss Ethel Asselstine has returned from visiting friends, at Hawley.

Visitors—Mr. and Mrs. Dupree, at Mr. W. Martin's, Mr. and Mrs. Forward, Mr. W. Fraser and Miss M. Amey, Mill Haven, at Ira Amey's, Misses Asselstine, Wartman and Winters, Sydenham, Mr. and Mrs. Alf. Knight, Napanee and Miss J. Miller, at W. W. Asselstine's.

SELBY.

One of the most enjoyable times of the season was an "At Home" at the Parsonage last week. It was a veritable "At Home" as everybody was given to feel just that way. It was held under the auspices of the Epworth League, and they spared no pains in making it a success. The social committee did their part well, furnishing a most excellent programme. The spacious house was full. After a good social time had been enjoyed, chatting, eating etc., Mr. David Wilson, president, called the meeting to order and graced the position of chairman well. Music, recitations and speeches, short and spicy were given as follows: Instrumental Music, Ernest Allen, Mr. Maybee, Mr. Mabbett and Miss Nettie Stratton, on different instruments, consisting of solos and duets. Solo singing and duet by Mr. J. C. Hudgins, Miss Edith Valleau and Mr. Maybee. Reading, by Mr. N. Irish. Addresses by Henry Wilson, John Aylsworth, Rev. H. I. Allen and the pastor, Rev. F. B. Stratton. Proceeds $14.00. The next one is to be at Mr. John Wilson's on Friday the 22nd. inst. It bids fair to surpass the other.

From another corocespondent.

MR. EDITOR—What has become of your regular correspondent? I think we ought to hear from her again.

Our Selby is still a village and there is not much signs of it becoming a city.

Mr. Stratton preached a very able and effective sermon on Sunday night, it was the kind of a sermon we like to hear.

Some of of our people are busy cutting up their summers wood.

The many friends of Mr. Datis Dennison are sorry to hear that he is not able to be out yet but hope for a speedy recovery.

Mr. Stratton had a bee sawing wood on Tuesday.

Mr. Alex Spencer is busy getting material ready to build a house in place of the one which was burned.

Willie looks a little down hearted, cheer up Will she will be home in a couple of months.

Ruben Hudgins has been busy getting up a lot of cedar stumps, Ruby is one of our industrious young men.

Mr. Marshal Schermerhorn bought a storms and pitch-holes of the past season. As a matter of fact everything has been so quiet that we had very little of importance to write on.

The elections for the House of Commons in the next month will cause a stir among politicians. We will soon hear both sides of the story.

There is very little work going on at present. There will be very little sugar made this spring. The robins have made their appearance.

Our contractors are seeking new contracts. We wish them success.

James S. Lockhead had the misfortune of getting the leg of one of his matched roadsters broken, through running away, on Sunday evening.

What has become of our Marlbank friend, we have not seen him lately? What's the matter George?

There will be no more good roads until the snow has gone.

HAY BAY.

Well now, as all the readers of THE EXPRESS are crazy to get their paper to see especially I know the news from this place. I will try my style in placing it in print.

Mr. Byard Young, of Napanee, was in our midst one day last week. He engaged Mr. James N. Moore to move his boat-house where ducks are thicker.

Mr. Hiram Sills had a bee last Thursday moving a barn.

Mr. Chester Kellar was in Deseronto on Sunday last. Attraction there I guess.

Mr. and Mrs. D. A. McCabe of this place were visiting friends in Prince Edward last week.

Mr. William Joyce and his two daughters, of Adolphustown Village, were the guest of Ashton McCabe, Esq. on Sunday last.

One of our farmers and stock raisers, Mr. Edda McCabe, has a cow that presented him with a pair of dandy calves.

Miss Emma Scott, of Napanee, is also visiting friends in this section.

The choir has changed their place for practise, I wonder what is wrong with the church.

A few of our boys are arguing who is to have the milk-route, be very careful boys or you will tell every person where the waggon is.

Young men from a distance, I want to tell you something; we have some pretty girls in this section, but they are married.

THANKFUL TO-DAY

THAT HE IS WELL.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, MAR. 22, 1895.

IT IS officially announced that Sir Mackenzie Bowell will not be a candidate for Kingston.

lion's share, has declined in accordance with the fall in value of farm products. Sixteen years ago the customs taxation of Canada was $12,782,824, in 1894 it was $19,198,114, or practically, according to the Tory theory of the increased purchasing power of a dollar, $38,396,228. The total taxation 16 years ago, in 1878, was $17,841,938, while in 1894 it was $27,,579,208, or practically $55,158,416. The expenditure 16 years ago was $23,503,158, while in 1894 it was $37,585,025, or practically $75,170,050. The net debt of Canada 16 years ago was $140,362,069, while to-day it is $249,407,462, or taking into consideration the depreciated value of a dollar it will mean, in comparison with 16 years ago, that our net debt is practically $498,814,924.

Our Cabinet Ministers still draw $8,000 a year, the same as 16 years ago. In comparison with the conditions in 1878 this is equal to $16,000. The sessional indemnity to M. P's. remain at the old figures, $1,000, equal to $2,000. We might continue this, but we forbear.

Unfortunately while this statement of Tory politicians is true as regards the commodities that farmers have to sell it does not apply except in a very few instances to the articles the farmers have to buy, which are kept up in price by a species of indirect taxation, called protection, that is rapidly driving the farmers of this country to the verge of bankruptcy.

With the paying powers of 70 per cent of the population reduced to one-half one would naturally imagine that the Government at Ottawa would shorten sail a bit. But no, the same lavish and corrupt expenditure of public money continues, and it is estimated that at the end of the present fiscal year the Government will have to face a deficit of over six million dollars.

"WILL shutting up a Canadian factory put money in your purse?" asks the Montreal Gazette. That depends largely on circumstances. If the said factory cannot compete with outside factories, when all the conditions are equal, why the sooner it is shut up the better. Any Canadian manufacturer who cannot get along without being bolstered and fed at the expense of the farmers of Canada had better retire from business at once. If he cannot conduct his factory without external aid there is no justification for the existence of that factory. He has no right to be a pauper on the public. The farmer receives no favors, he has to depend on his own resources and compete with all comers. The sooner we shut up these mushroom factories that cannot live without protection the better for all concerned. It will make room for the shrewd, independant and resourceful manufacturer, at present handicapped by these parasites, who will conduct his factory on a business basis. The abolition of the N. P. will break the power of the combines and stimulate healthy and legitimate trade.

CANADIAN PACFIC RAILWAY.

Some time ago the Montreal Daily Star published an article on the Canadian Pacific Railway giving something about its early history, what it received from the country in cash and land, etc., and its financing and dividend paying powers. A few extracts from the Star's report cannot fail to be of interest to our readers:

"The passing of the usual half yearly dividend of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the ordinary stock has been made the subject of much comment in financial and political circles and has led many to enquire into the Company's financial methods and the history of the contract, construction, completion and further development of the vast system since the original syndicate was awarded the contract for the building of a transcontinental railway across British North America. From official documents at Ottawa and the Company's statements it appears

On November 28, 1882, the capital was further increased to $100,000,000 and $40,000,000 of the increase was sold at an average price of 52 per cent, the balance being deposited with the Dominion Government. In the year 1885 the $35,000,000 so deposited was cancelled, and the common stock thus reduced to $65,000,000. It will be remembered that in September, 1883, the Company deposited with the Dominion Government an amount sufficient to guarantee dividend of 3 per cent, upon the Company's outstanding stock for ten years, and at this time the Company had not completed its main line. Fourteen million dollars of the capital of the Company was the amount deposited to guarantee the 3 per cent dividend on the ordinary stock to the founders amounted to 12 per cent, having secured the bulk of their stock at 25 cents on the dollar. The financial position and start of the Company was of the brightest, having the entire resources and credit of Canada to support any further financing, and the executive and management counted among the shrewdest and ablest men on the mart or railway circles.

* * * *

In 1883, the Company got a loan of thirty millions from the Government, for the formation of the guarantee fund The following was the proposal submitted by the then president of the Company (now Lord Mount-Stephen) to the Government, October, 1883. The latter agreed to raise and deposit with the Government $20,000,000 in cash, the balance of $4,527,145 to be made up of a deposit of land grant bonds. The proposition was at once accepted, though Mr. Blake at the time according to Hansard urged that instead of locking up this amount to secure future dividends on stock, and appealing to the Government for aid, the Company should use the money to complete its contract, and let the stockholders forego their dividends for a while.

Further public aid was granted in 1884 to the extent of another loan of $30,000,000, and in 1885 further aid was demanded to finish the road. It was on this occasion that the Hon. Edward Blake made a memorable speech on the subject, showing what the Company had up to then received from the country towards the construction of the line. On the 17th of June, 1885, Mr. Blake delivered his speech reported in Hansard, from which the following is taken: "The Government builds and hands over to the Company 641 miles of completed railway, besides the Pembina Branch costing $30,000,000. The Government surveys cost $3,440,000. The Government subsidy is $25,000,000 in cash. The Government's provision of lands and powers has already realized to the Company $11,000,000. That makes $69,500,000, besides which there remain 20,000 000 acres of land. So there were $69,500,000 in cash aids and 20,000,000 acres of land. If you value that at $1 per acre you get public aids, not loans, but gifts, of $89,500,000. If you value it at $2 you get $109,500,000. Now, add the loans of 1884. They amount to $29,810,000. Then you have gifts as before, $69,500,000, loans, $29,810,000, or cash aids of $99,310,000. Adding the $20,000,000 acres of land at $2, it gives you a total of gifts and loans of $139,310,000. The cost of the whole line according to the Company's own estimate, was $83,500,000, and the equipment $8,000,000, making a total of $91,500,000, and the road is to be the property of the Company, and both the Company and the Government declare it is going to pay from the day it is opened. We have given them the means, to build that paying road, and the First Minister tells us that the road will carry freights at one-fourth the cost of other roads, and a road that can do that will certainly be a highly paying road."

Mr. Blake also pointed out that the $5,000,000 to be given to the Company by the resolutions under discussion would increase the public aid to the Company to $144,810 000, and that $13,827,000 more would have to be spent in aiding the construction of the railway through Maine to the Atlantic seaboard and other roads connected with the trancon inental railway project. Then he exposed the Company's financial methods. He said. "They raised by the new finance on stock $24,500,000, and they have devoted to dividends $21,000,000, making $3,500,000, to go on with the work, and $21,000,000 to go into their own pockets. What is the amount they have actually paid in dividends up to Feb last (1885)? On the first $5,000,000 they have paid $1,000,300, on the $20,000,000, which represents $5,000,000 cash, they have paid $2,610,000 on the $30,000,000, representing $15,281,000, they have paid $2,-

Horne being in Chicago, was interviewed on the Canadian Pacific construction and development. Speaking of the beginning of the work he is reported in the Chicago Sunday Herald to have said among other things:

The Company borrowed from the Government $30,000,000 in cash, in addition to its gift of $25,000,000, and that, with other resources from land and so on, built the road, and it was built in first class shape.

"To return to the obligations. The Canadian Government attempted first to build the road, and to that end appropriated $25,000,000 cash as it might be called for, and 25,000,000 acres of land.

* * * *

When the project was transferred to the corporation the Government had completed several sections. It had built a road up from Vancouver; it had built a couple of sections through Manitoba; it had circumvented the north shore of Lake Superior from Rat Portage east, or, rather, from nowhere to nowhere, and it had a good many miles in Eastern Canada, but there was nothing that could be made consecutive or cohesive. The branch line from Winnipeg South to connect with United States lines was also under operation. All this was given to the new Company.

The Canadian Pacific therefore took the whole load of the Government. To do all this it borrowed in cash or credit the sum of $30,000,000 from the Canadian Government. Now let us sum up—$25,000,000 an actual gift before the road became a corporation 25,000,000 acres of land, $30,000,000 borrowed on the credit of the Dominion.

The $25,000,000 cash was an absolute gift to whoever should build a road. It is possible that it may now be a part of Canada's obligation to the world, but to us it was an out and out gift. It was so understood when the amount was voted. The Government started in to build on the strength of the gift, and spent a great portion of it. The work was badly done. The sections of roads were badly planned; when the Company came into control it got this $25,000,000 in cash in the shape of half-completed roads, worthless without connections, and it got 25,000,000 acres of land, worse than worthless unless that for which it was given could be finished.

Sir William then concluded by asserting that not one of the chief promoters of the Canadian Pacific had made a colossal fortune by his connection with the enterprise.

CAUGHT HIM ON A CAB.

It was an abominably wet day. You know what that means in London—cab drivers' millennium, little mud pie makers' Elysian fields, despair and petticoat ruin to fair pedestrians! Mrs. Lancaster stood under the shelter of a fashionable modiste's door, looked forward and groaned. No hansom in sight; ruin to her clothes stared her in the face if she sallied out; ruin to her purse whispered to her behind should she enter the shop again.

"The dispensation of gain is not in Providence diocese," was her irreverent summing up. "He'd make it rain at the proper times or on No Man's Land if it were. Oh, darling!" she murmured under her breath, for a hansom bore in sight, looming. Whisterishly, hazily wet. A slashing golden bay between the shafts and a civil Jehu perched up behind.

Out went her umbrella and she tucked up her frills. She signalled; he drew up and she dashed out. The man, careful fellow, had closed the doors and let down the window. An agonized endeavor to open door, balance umbrella, rescue skirts from mud, and save new bonnet ensued. He saw that, and with unusual, uncabbylike courtesy, jumped down, saying:

"Allow me."

The lady gave a little scream.

"Tom! you driving a hansom?"

"No worse than driving my coach, is it, Mrs. Lancaster?" he retorted.

"Oh! Tom, dear, what on earth are you doing it for?" Then, with a high-handed attempt at dignity: Might I ask the reason for this new and extraordinary metier? Is it for a bet?"

"A bet? Oh, dear no!" A distinct pause. "That bonnet of yours is getting rather the worst of it; it's a pity, for it's rather a would like to make everybody rich by protection, provided nobody had to pay for it."

Tory organs inform us in one line that Protection does not enhance the price of the home made article, and in the next that our factories will have to shut down and cease to do business if the N. P. is abolished.

The latest evidence that Tory papers have adduced to convince the unbelieving farmer of his unequalled prosperity is the large increase in life insurance in Canada during the past year. We might also add that there has been a large increase in murders and that the authorities don't approve of some of the insurance methods in vogue.

THE PURCHASING POWER OF A DOLLAR.

Tory politicians inform the farmers that the purchasing power of a dollar in Canada has doubled. That a dollar to day will procure as much as two dollars would twenty years ago. Let us examine this statement briefly, honestly and dispassionately.

With wheat fluctuating between fifty-five and sixty cents per bushel it must be admitted that a dollar to-day will purchase more of this staple commodity than two dollars would some years ago. Take the prevailing prices of most farm products and you will find that they have gone on steadily declining in value till to-day fifty cents will purchase what required a dollar to buy a few years ago. This is all very true, but unfortunately for the farmer he does not want to purchase but to sell these articles, and this is where the shoe pinches most acutely.

But let us see if the cost of government, of which the farmer pays the 1881, and the main line opened throughout on May 26, 1887. The several branches and leased lines were built or acquired at different periods. The road was created, fostered and lavishly endowed by the Dominion Government. The public credit of the Dominion was at the back of the concern for tens of millions of dollars to carry the railway to completion. The contract made with the Government was for the construction and operation of a through line of railway from Callander, on the east side of Lake Nipissing, to the Pacific coast. The Government also agreed that over $30,000,000 should be expended by the Government in the building and completing of certain sections of the railway, some of them difficult and costly. In fact the Canadian Government agreed to give and did give in the form of subsidies payable as the work prospered :

(1) Thirty million dollars' worth of completed railway sections.

(2) Twenty-five million dollars in cash.

(3) Twenty-five million acres of public lands on the prairies of the North-West.

(4) The privilege of importing rails and other supplies into Canada free of duty.

(5) A monopoly of the railway traffic of the North-West—the Government of Canada binding itself not to permit the construction of any railway southward from the Canadian Pacific to the United States boundary line. The value of these last mentioned privileges was very great. The Government had to buy out the monopoly privilege from the Company in 1888 to prevent the Manitobans from taking arms to secure its abolition."

The original capital of the Company was $5,000,000 issued at par, which was increased to $25,000,000 on May 10th, 1882, the $20,000,000 new stock being sold to the founders at 25 cents on the dollar. The issue of new stock brought into the Company's treasury $5,000,000 and at this time only small headway had been made on the main line and earnings were small, yet, as a pretty well informed financier points out, so great were its resources owing to its having the credit of Canada at command, that it could afford to pay 6 per cent. dividends out of capital upon stock which it had given away at 25 cents on the dollar. $750,000, or a total of $7,000,000 already paid in cash to its shareholders by this embarassed Company, which has to come to us in its urgent need. And having paid $7,000,000 in cash they have deposited with the Government now, at 4 per cent. interest, $14,100,000 to secure future dividends. * * * I ask you what is to be expected from finance like that? The original proprietors who took the addition l $20,000,000 have, on their $5,000,000 of cash, for which they received $20,000,000 of stock, got for part of the time 24 per cent. per annum on their investment, and for the rest 20 per cent. * * * They have got $3,610,000 in dividends already, and they are to get in eight years and a half $6,875,000 more, or $10,485,000 in dividends apart altogether from the road, the land, and the earnings of the road on $10,000,000 of capital. * * * If you include the September (1885) and February (1886) extra dividends, there will have been paid and provided for dividends $24,875,000, or a sum equal to the whole amount realized from the sale of the Company's stock.

"The shareholders will have paid $24,500,000 for their stock, and there will have been paid and provided for dividends $24,500,000 The net result of the transaction has been to invest money with one hand for the purpose of taking it out with the other. In substance, the proceeds of the stock have been divided among the stockholders. We (the Government) are to raise the money to build the road, and the country is to pay tolls for all time in order to pay dividends upon the stock so divided. * * *

All this is to be done because the stockholders in this enterprise having realized from $67,000,000 of stock $24,500,000, have chosen to appropriate $24,500,000 to pay dividends upon their stock."

Mr. Blake again urged the spending of the deposit to guarantee 3 p. c. dividends to complete the road. During the session of Parliament in 1893 an act was passed authorizing the Company to issue preferred stock to the extent of one-half its ordinary stock. This gave the Company power to issue and sell $32,500,000 of preferred stock as its outstanding shares amount to $65,000,000. In the year 1893 and about the month of February, Sir William Van she who knows the ways and means of bonnets, or rather the ways of the bonnets, and the means of those who can afford such a one as he saw before him. he eyed it critically, though not feeling nearly so cool as he was anxious to make her believe.

"Oh! what does that matter?" she snapped out. "Be so good as not to make personal remarks. I shall spoil as many bonnets as I choose," with glaring independence.

"Hm! you always used to do so," glowering down at her.

"Do you refuse, then, to drive me?" she faltered. There wasn't another cab in sight.

"Oh, dear, no! When a man's poor and has to earn his living by the sweat of his brow he is likely to find the latter more plentiful than the former; so I am only too glad to get what fares I can." He gloated wickedly, for she looked up in his face while a mist gathered and grew in his eyes, and she gave a little sob.

"Oh, Tom, dear Tom," she whispered, "I never knew it was so bad as this."

"Didn't you?" he answered, with brutal unsympathy for her sympathy with him in his altered circumstances. Then he banged open the door, raised the window and stood by her in an attitude of calm impatience.

She gave another imploring glance. He was eyeing his noble beast's hindquarters, his mouth punched up in an audible whistle. "Colonia never could stand in the rain," he said, reflectively, as if taking her into his confidence.

Mrs. Lancaster sighed and stepped into the hansom.

She settled herself in a corner of the cab with another sigh and a furtive glance at the looking-glass to her left, while the driver mounted behind and slowly gathered up the reins. He banged down the window and slapped open the little trapdoor overhead with professional noise, and then "Where to?" with professional brevity.

"Home, please, if you don't mind," said his fare, meekly.

As they drove down Bond street, Mrs. Lancaster's eyes being shut off from outward sights, she turned them inward and viewed her whirling thoughts.

"What a story this would make if anyone only knew, or if I only had the pen of a ready writer. It's really quite a pity that my gift all runs to seed in correspondence.

"Poor darling, how wet he must be getting up there!"

they turned into Piccadilly. Mrs. Lancaster profited by the occasion. She took her umbrella and pushed up the skylight.

It was immediately opened.

Mr. Lancaster looked down; Mrs. Lancaster looked up.

"Do you want to get out? I am afraid you cannot. We may have to wait here a quarter of an hour."

"It isn't that," she answered. "I wanted to know, er—I thought, er—I wanted to ask. Oh, Tom, dear, aren't you very wet and cold up there?"

"Thank you! one could scarcely expect there should be a draught up here, or to find it parchingly hot—but I'm quite comfortable, thank you, all the same." With a male's inconsistency.

She watched as he glanced at the two easy chairs, one at each side of the blazing fire. How often had they occupied them in the happy past! Only then, to be sure, they had been drawn close side by side and they had proved the fallibility of the rule that "two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time."

THE SCRUB ANIMALS AS COMPARED WITH THE WELL-BRED.

One Cannot Be Taught and the Other Takes to Training Like a Calf to Milk—A Visit to a Strange Institution in Berlin—Education of the Bull-Dog.

Strauss, the dog trainer of the Pinzen Allee, in Berlin, has an institution where he prepares his canine pupils for more skillful labor. Terriers are taught how to dispatch the largest number of rats in the shortest time possible, little dogs are instructed in all sorts of tricks for public exhibition! watch dogs are trained for farms and large warehouses, etc. His principal occupation consists in providing dog detectives for the police.

That it is possible to train dogs for many useful functions on the farm and in the home and in many industries has been conclusively demonstrated. In Germany and in northern countries of Europe, where horses are scarcer than in America and in tropical lands they are made to carry burdens, draw carts and make themselves useful as a propelling power. Go and visit any day the markets of Amsterdam, Rotterdam or Utrecht, in Holland, for instance, and hundreds of carts are met with laden with vegetables, fruits, and other produce, to which four, six, and sometimes eight, large dogs are harnessed.

A visitor to the Strauss Institute wrote some time ago that a dog graduated from this training will prove a match for the most powerful man, whom he will throw and hold until ordered to desist by his master. There are always some twenty or thirty candidates under the care of Herr Strauss, who are kept in large inclosures with high fences. At the approach of a friendly visitor they are allowed to rush in the central arena and are taught to sniff around his legs without indulging in further molestations. To be the center of attraction of such a ferocious pack induces uncomfortable feelings. The frisky fellows might forget their parts, and get it into their heads to tear the pantaloons to tatters and bite a few mouthfuls from one's anatomy. The the entire handling of the animal. When she came to drive it before the carriage, and gave it the word to start the mare invariably looked around before she would go, to see if the reins were up and all in readiness. Driving before a sleigh one day, the vehicle overturned. The mare stopped short. When the sleigh was righted and word given to go, the mare looked around as usual, but refused to start. Instead, she danced about gently, and kept turning her head around and looking back. Thinking something was wrong, the lady looked about, too, when she discovered her extra shawl lying on the snow crust at some distance, where the wind had blown it. When this was recovered, word to go was given again, the mare saw all was right and then moved on. It is unnecessary to state what a large majority of scrubs would have done under similar circumstances.

Mules are the dumbest of all farm animals. They are the Ishmaels of the brute creation. Their heels are against everybody, and everybody's heels are against them; and this because they have no breeding whatever. Jersey cows evince the most noble breeding. No animals are kinder or gentler. The Holsteins do not lack intelligence. When at the Smith & Powell stock farm in Central New York a few years ago they had a herd of sixty Holstein milch cows. In coming from pasture to barn they had to turn a square corner where the butter maker resided. The house was back from the street line some distance, there was a flower garden in front and on the corner, which was not protected by a fence. Looking out of the window and observing the cows approaching, I askod the butter maker if he was not going out to protect his flowers. He replied, "No, sir; the cows have been told to keep off, and they never molest the garden. They seem to know it is forbidden ground." On that 600 acre farm there are few or no inside fences. The proprietors find it cheaper to employ a boy herder than to maintain fences. There are hay, grain and pasture fields adjoining, but the cows have learned to keep where they belong, and it is rare that one steps over the boundary. It can be easily imagined what would occur to this flower garden and the grain fields were this merely a herd of scrub cows.

My neighbor has a full-blooded Chester White boar. Two or three times he has entered open barn or shed doors, where it was not proper for him to be.

are driving by the most opposite and roundabout route.

She had money of her own, a good £1,500 a year, and when the final split came—a split born of a very small rift—he had been too proud to let her know how his money matters stood, and so it came about that husband and wife had not met for quite a year, and that during the last five weeks he had driven a raking bay about London, harnessed to a luxurious "St. T." hansom.

And he? Well, he was thinking of what a thundering ass he had been and how he had tried her love and faith in him.

And she? Well, had she too, not flirted just a bit with Lord Racque and Colonel Targent, and when he had remonstrated ever so little had she not flared out on him and thrust that odious, yellow-haired Signora Sorella in his face?

"I wish he wouldn't drive quite so fast," she thought. "We shall get home so soon if he does."

They were passing a restaurant. She slanted her umbrella toward it, and he drew up instantly.

"If you don't mind," she said, "I am just going in for a glass of wine; I feel a little faint."

It was no such thing, for in two minutes she was out again, the wine untouched and the glass in her hand.

"You must have got so wet and cold I wish you—would you?" she stammered, timidly—"would you mind just taking a little—to—to please me?"

She had taken off her glove, and the broad wedding band caught his eye. A spasm of pain came upon his face. It was like driving your fist through a mirror and smashing the smooth, even surface into bits.

"Thank you," he said, a little unsteadily, in a rather husky voice, as he descended slowly from his perch.

"Oh! I will take it in for you."

"I could not think of giving a lady my glass to put down," he answered with his old characteristic courtesy toward the womanhood.

About a quarter of an hour later the hansom drew up in Norfolk street.

Mrs. Lancaster got out and walked slowly up the steps. Before ringing she turned around. A little ragamuffin was inspecting her.

"Would you like a sixpence?" she asked him gravely. A superfluous question, to which he replied, with the knowledge of past experience to guide him, and a wisdom beyond his winters:

"Sixpences were not to be 'ad for nothin'."

"Of course not," she answered, "and you have only to hold the horse's head for a little. You needn't be afraid," she added, rashly guaranteeing the beast's peaceful nature, "and you shall have sixpence."

Thus having reduced the legion of unemployed by one, she turned and rang the bell.

"Do you mind coming in for a few minutes?" she said, addressing her husband, "I want to tell you something."

He looked at her for an instant, then settled his whip in its socket, tied the reins securely and descended slowly.

"But the servants?"

"The only two whom you will see are new ones.

The door opened—"Dinner at once and lay another place at table."

"You remember this, and this (pausing before some picture or some hanging), and this vase; do you remember how nearly I was drowned out of that gondola at Venice—it was just opposite those glass works, and you insisted on our going in and buying something to remind you, and how thankful you were that it had ended in nothing worse than a drenching?"

"I have forgotten nothing," he answered gravely.

"Not even the way to your dressing-room," she said archly, turning around.

"Not even the way to my dressing-room," replied Mrs. Lancaster.

threw a sharp breath, and a spasm shot across his face, leaving it a shade or two whiter. He glanced up—his wife was looking at him in breathless stillness. She turned quickly and left the room.

He found his way out about ten minutes afterward—Mrs. Lancaster took a little longer.

There was a soft dewiness about her eyes as she came and stood beside him. Husband's and wife's hands met in a quick, close grip, and a feeling of infinite love came nestling around his heart.

"Tom," she began wistfully.

"Yes, Cecile?" questioningly.

There was no time for another word, the door handle was slowly moving around.

"It's my sheep dog, Miss Meeson," she whispered, her breach coming and going, for a sudden puzzlesome question had arisen in her mind. She had forgotten all about Miss Meeson—to tell the truth she had not taken her into account at all. What was she to do and say? Introduce Tom as this afternoon's hansom cab driver and nothing else? Goodness, no; it would not be possible. Introduce him as a friend only? Yes, but what if there were to come a reconciliation?

How horrid and deceitful it would look! But introduce Tom as her husband! (A quick throb at her heart). What if he insisted on their remaining only friends? What if he should reject the projected forgiveness? What if he should exclaim: "Pardon me; I was her husband at one time, but Mrs. Lancaster desired to dissolve the partnership?" What agony and humiliation?

The door opened and the dear, humble old sheep dog entered—far too meek of aspect to cow any ravening wolf except by her old-fashioned stately sweetness.

"Miss Meeson, said Mrs. Lancaster," falteringly, "Miss Meeson, dear we have a guest at dinner to-night; let me introduce Tom—my Tom! The man who was ever and ever will be the dearest and best of men. There—there was a slight misunderstanding, almost all my fault; but we have found, he and I—me—that's to say—I mean he—we"— There was a pucker on her face, she faltered, and then said tremulously and with exquisite tenderness, "He is my dear husband!" Then she smiled up in his face and laid her head on his shoulder, as much out of the fullness of her love as to hide that awful cabman's badge, which blazed hugely on his breast. Then she laughed—a queer little laugh, that had a glimpse of tears in it not so very far off.

Miss Meeson held out her hand with a much puzzled air, but Mr. Lancaster saw neither that nor the look. His eyes were moistened with unshed tears, and his wife's head when he looked down seemed to be some blurred mass of golden brown on his shoulder, and the lights seemed suddenly to have got misty and to flicker up and down.

"I left my spectacles in the other room," said Miss Meeson softly, though she was peering through them as she spoke.

I think that there was something very like a look of rapture on both husband and wife's faces.

"You have forgotten to pay me my fare," he said after a bit. "Do you chisel all your cabbies out of their fares, dear?"

She laughed up into his face with a murmur of womanly tenderness.

"Well, your real fare is two shillings, but I will give you a 'golden crown.'"

She raised her face as she spoke. No need to explain the meaning of the words to one who loved her as did this strange cabman. He took the "golden crown" between both his hands and kissed her fair forehead tenderly.

Husband and wife were reunited, never to part again. It was not until their mutual tears of joy had ceased that the little urchin in the street was remembered. He and another little imp were found taking it in turns to watch the horse.—Belgravia.

familiar they are ordered back to their kennels.

After this a course of instruction is begun on a life model in the same manner, but with more caution and more vigorous and well-meant opposition on the part of the model. Woe to the dog if he happens to scratch the face, even slightly, or if he handles the clothing of the model too roughly, but he must concentrate his dental energy to the rubber collar, and later to the plain coat or vest-collar. The whip is frequently used, but after the dog has done his task well he is kindly petted and suitably rewarded. It has been found that Newfoundlands and St. Bernards and even hunting dogs can be fitted for this purpose.

Herr Strauss is an expert, and has a remunerative occupation. Hundreds of mannshunden, as they are called, leave his institute annually, and their masters pay a good round sum for their schooling. Many others besides police officials bring pupils. Private gentlemen want brave, watchful and obedient protectors for their homes and persons against thieves and enemies.

The best candidates are the so-called Leonberg bull pups, and they should not be more than 2 years old. What Herr Strauss calls stubendressur, a tedious, preliminary indoor training, is indispensible in every case. It is only a means to an end. Through such discipline the dog is taught the first lesson in obedience. He is made to sit on his haunches, to beg for his food, to walk on his hind legs, to jump over sticks and through hoops, to carry baskets filled with meat; in short, all that a well-bred dog ought to know. Only after having been rendered perfectly docile and obedient can the next step be taken. With most dogs this constitutes the longest period of their training.

The object of the next drill is to teach the dog to attack a supposed enemy or criminal with its forepaws and teeth in such a way as to throw him without wounding him. He must keep the man prostrate, and not let go until ordered to do so by his master. Only dummies can at first be used for this purpose. A stuffed figure is placed behind an almost closed door. An attendant at the opposite end of the room slowly pulls a string tied to the doorknob, until the figure is in sight of a pair of dogs held by the trainer. As soon as the dogs espy the dummy there is a loud barking and scrambling to get loose. Here is the first fault to be thrashed out of them. They must learn to do their work in true detective fashion, sleuth-like and in silence. They are not even permitted the first time to get at the dummy. The next time they are allowed to run to the door, but are taught to refrain until the dummy has been pulled in.

He is next taught to direct his bites to the collar. The figure is made to apply his hands in vigorous defence, but the bulldog must get used to all this, and must not release his firm hold until ordered to do so by the trainer. Then he must again always be ready to renew his attack at short notice.

Dummies employed for baiting purposes, are from 5½ to 6 feet high. As a life model the man feeds the dogs is taken at first, as he is then not so liable to be hurt, but after the first experiments strangers, who are well paid for their services, are brought in. These are, as a rule, men temporarily out of work, and they are not easily induced to expose their bodies to the fury of the bull-dogs, since at all events even if they are not wounded or hurt, disagreeable shocks are experienced in the first encounters.

Dr. Galen Wilson has written an article in The Practical Farmer to prove the superiority of the blooded animal over the scrub in the matter of intelligence and susceptibility to training. In support of his contention, he cites these incidents:

"Thoroughbred equines are altogether different animals. They 'take' to education as a calf does to milk, and seem to delight in being tutored. In acquiring knowledge, there is as much difference between them and scrubs as there is between bright white men and African negroes. They possess the brain, and know or learn many things by intuition. All horsemen know this. I will cite only one case. A lady reared a blooded mare from a colt. She had tempted to enter through one of these doors, even when open all day. The attendant says: "I could not drive him into one of those doors now. He seems to know he is not wanted there." He "knows," because he has the intelligence. We had a blooded dog, which weighs 18 pounds. He is a persistent hunter for all sorts of small animals that infest the farm. It is amusing to observe the intelligence he displays sometimes. I saw his first encounter with a snake. It was a long one. He caught the snake by the neck and in a second, the reptile had wound his tail about one of the dog's legs. There was "ground and lofty tumbling," with several "kiyis" for a few minutes. When the snake's hold was broken, the dog changed his tactics and seizing the snake by the tail, swung him full length in the air several times, slapping his head upon the ground each time as he came down and this continued until the life was beaten out of it.

After destroying all the woodchucks on the farm, he visited daily a deep, wooded ravine nearby, through which a stream of water runs. Woodchucks burrowed near the tops of the banks, as is their custom. It was the dog's habit to lie in hiding nearby and watch for a "chuck" going down to drink. If small, he would give battle at once and kill him; but if large enough to be a match for him, he would worry him, clinch him by the hind parts when he could, and jerk him towards the nearest deep water hole, and when he reached the brink, he would watch his chances and jerk the animal into the water and drown him. He once killed a chuck in this manner that weighed 22 pounds—4 more than his own weight. "A cur of low degree" goes in for a fight at once, whether he whips or gets whipped. He does not know enough to apply "tactics."

These incidents are related only to show the superior intelligence blooded animals possess, and as such they cause their owners more pleasure and much less worry than scrubs. Besides, blooded meat animals keep and fatten easier, and all of them are usually much more profitable. "Blood will tell," but not every time. For some unknown reason, there is an occasional blooded scrub, as there is once in a while a dull child among a family of bright children.

Millinery Opening!

Grand Display of this season's Styles at Cheapside, SATURDAY, 23rd MARCH, to continue all next week inoluding Sat. 30th.

New Millinery Novelties to arrive next week.
New Things to be shown in Dress Goods.
New Things in Prints and Sateens
New Things in Capes and Cape Materials.
New Things in Ladies' Duck Suitings.
New Things in Men's Suitings bought below regular values,

The whole store is assuming a Spring appearance, changing its clothes, so to speak. Our Furs will be left open still another week in the basement. Last Saturday was a great day for Men's Coats. Only 6 Men's Fur Coats left. We will take $9.00 each for them rather than pack them away for the summer. You'll be glad to pay $15 for them next fall.

Now, "a long push, a strong push and a push altogether" will "get a moving impetus" on these few Fur Mantles. We put a big push on the price. You'll perhaps never see equal goods at equally low prices again.

Though we are putting in New Goods and freshening up the stock for Spring don't forget "there s no let up" to the low prices on the Hinch & Co. Bankrupt Stock. Bound to clear the goods out. As the low lines go out we put some of the better, higher lines down in price.

For instance, 30c, 35c and 40c Dress Goods were put down to 15c.
Colored Shirts that were $1.10 put down to 25c.
A lot of Ties were 20c to 25c now 5 cents.
We are developing sensations almost every day in the way of low prices.
Sensations in Cotton and Loom Bargains.
Sensations in Yarn, Silk and Veil Bargains.
Sensations in Dress Goods Bargains.
Sensations in Shirting, Gingham, and Cottonade Bargains.
Sensations in Ready-Made Clothing and Overcoat Bargains.
Sensations in Dress Trimming Bargains.

We are constantly on the lookout for special bargains, and a member of our firm is either in Toronto or Montreal every week ready to secure for spot cash any plum that may be offered. You can come to Cheapside with every assurance that you will get the best value for your money that can be obtained in the Central District.

As we go to press we have just received a lot of Men's Fine Quality Linen Collars worth 20c and 25c, which we will clear at 3 for 25c.

Fine 35c Linen Cuffs at 15c a pair.

A lot of 27 inch Skirt Embroideries to be cleared at 25c a yard.

P.S.—There has been another "mark down" on those Jersey Jackets. We will sell one lot at 25c, that were worth up to $2 each.

Another Lot we will clear at 50 cents that were worth up to $6 each. They must go quick.

CHAPTER VIII.

But the driving-party did not come off. For while Edith and Trixy's somewhat unpleasant interview was taking place in one part of the house, an equally unpleasant and much more mysterious interview was taking place in another, and on the same subject.

Lady Helena had left the guests for a while and gone to her own rooms. The morning post had come in, bringing her several letters. One in particular she seized, and read with more eagerness than the others, dated London, beginning "My Dear Aunt," and signed "Inez." While she sat absorbed over it, in deep and painful thought evidently, there came a tap at the door; then it opened, and her nephew came in.

She crumpled her letter hurriedly in her hand, and put it out of sight. She looked up with a smile of welcome; he was the "apple of her eye," the darling of her life, —the fair-haired, pleasant faced young baronet.

"Do I intrude?" he asked. "Are your letters very important this morning? If so——"

"Not important at all. Come in, Victor. I have been wishing to speak to you of the invitations for next week's ball. Is it concerning the driving-party this afternoon you want to speak?"

"No, my dear aunt; something very much pleasanter than all the driving in the world."

She looked at him more closely. His face was flushed, his eyes bright, a happy smile was on his lips.

"Agreeably important, then, I am sure, judging by your looks."

"Congratulate me, Aunt Helena; I am the happiest man the wide earth holds.

"My dear Victor!"

"Cannot you guess?" he said, still smiling; "I always thought female relatives were particularly sharp-sighted in these matters. Have you no suspicions of my errand here?"

"I have not, indeed;" but she sat erect, and her fresh-colored, handsome old face grew pale. "Victor, what is it? Pray speak out."

"Very well. Congratulate me once more; I am going to be married."

He stopped short, for with a low cry that was like a cry of fear, Lady Helena rose up. If he had said "I am going to be hanged," the consternation of her face could not have been greater.

"No, no!" she said, in that frightened voice; "not married. For God's sake, Victor, don't say that!"

"Lady Helena!"

He sat looking at her, utterly confounded.

"It can't be true," she panted. "You don't mean that. You are too young, you are. What do boys like you want of wives! —only three-and-twenty?"

He laughed good-humoredly.

"My dear aunt, boys of three-and-twenty are tolerably well-grown; it isn't a bad age to marry."

She sat down suddenly, her head against the back of a chair, her face quite white.

"Aunt Helena," the young man said anxiously, approaching her, "I have startled you; I have been too sudden with this. You look quite faint; what shall I get you?"

He seized a carafe of water, but she waved it away.

"Wait," she said, with trembling lips; "wait. Give me time—let me think. It was sudden; I will be better in a moment."

She remained pale and silent for upward of five very long minutes; only once her lips whispered, as if unconsciously:

"The time has come—the time has come."

It was Sir Victor himself who broke the embarrassing pause.

"Aunt Helena," he said pettishly, for he was not accustomed to have his sovereign will disputed, "I don't understand this, and you will pardon me if I say I don't like it. It must have entered your mind that sooner or later I would fall in love and marry a wife, like other men. That time has come, as you say yourself. There is nothing I can see to be shocked at."

"But not so soon," she answered brokenly. "O Victor, not so soon."

"I don't consider twenty-three years too soon. I love her with all my heart." His kindling eyes and softened voice betrayed it. "Thank Heaven she has accepted me. Without her my life would not be worth the having."

"Who is she?" she asked, without looking up. "Lady Gwendoline, of course."

"Lady Gwendoline?" He smiled and lifted his eyebrows.

"No, my dear aunt; a very different person from Lady Gwendoline. Miss Darrell."

Edith Darrell—the American girl, she—Victor, if this is a jest——"

"Lady Helena, am I likely to jest on such a subject? It is the truth. This morning Miss Darrell—Edith—has made me the happiest man in England by promising to be my wife. Surely, aunt, you must have seen that I loved her."

"I have seen nothing," she answered blankly, looking straight before her—"nothing. I am only an old woman—I am growing blind and stupid, I suppose."

There was a pause. At no time was Sir Victor Catheron a fluent or ready speaker—just at present, perhaps, it was natural he should be rather at a loss for words.

"I have loved her from the first," he said, breaking once more the silence—"from the very first night of the party, without knowing it. In all the world, she is the only one I can ever marry. You, who have been as a mother to me all my life, will not mar my perfect happiness on this day of days by saying you object."

"But I do object!" Lady Helena, exclaimed, with sudden energy and anger. "More—I absolutely refuse. I say again, you are too young to want to marry at all. When you are thirty it will be quite time enough to talk of this. Go abroad again—see the world."

Sir Victor Catheron smiled, a very quiet and terribly obstinate smile.

"My extreme youth, then, is your only objection?"

"No, it is not—I have a hundred objections—it is objectionable from every point. I object to her most decidedly and absolutely. You shall not marry this American girl without family or station, and of whom you know absolutely nothing—with whom you have not been acquainted four weeks."

His smile left his face—a frown came instead. His lips set, he looked at her with a face of invincible determination.

"Is this all?" he demanded. "I will answer your objections when I have thoroughly heard them. I am my own master—but—that much is due to you."

"I tell you she is beneath you—beneath you!" Lady Helena said vehemently. "The Catherons have always married well—into ducal families. Your grandmother—my sister—was, as I am, the daughter of a marquis."

"And my mother was the daughter of a soap-boiler," he said with bitterness. "Don't let us forget that."

"Why do you speak to me of her? I can't bear it. You know I cannot. You do well to taunt me with the plebeian blood in your veins—you, of all men alive. Oh! why did you ever see this designing girl? Why did she ever come between us?"

"When you call her designing, Lady Helena," he said, in slow, angry tones, "you go a little too far. In no way has Miss Darrell tried to win me—'tis the one drawback to my perfect happiness now that she does not love me as I love her. She has told me so frankly and bravely. But it will come. I feel that such a love as mine must win a return. For the rest, I deny that she is beneath me; and in conclusion, I say that it is my unalterable determination to marry Edith Darrell at the earliest possible hour that I can prevail upon her to fix our wedding day."

She looked at him; the unalterable determination he spoke of was printed in every line of his set face.

"I might have known it," she said, with suppressed bitterness; "he is his father's son. The same obstinacy—the same refusal to listen to all warning."

The tears coursed slowly over her cheeks, and moved him as nothing she ever could have said would have done.

"For Heaven's sake, aunt, don't cry," he said hurriedly. "You distress me—you make me feel like a brute, and I—really now, I don't think you ought to blame me in this way." He took both her hands in his and looked at her—a resolute smile on his fair blonde face.

"Troubles are like certain wild animals," he said; "look them straight in the eye and they turn and take to flight. Why should I not marry at twenty-three? If I were marrying any one else—Lady Gwendoline for instance—would my extreme juvenility still be an obstacle?"

"You had much better not marry at all."

"What! live a crusty old batchelor! Now, now, my good aunt, this is a little too much, and not at all what I expected from a lady of your excellent common-sense."

"There is nothing to make a jest of, Victor. It is better you should not marry—better the name of Catheron should die out and be blotted from the face of the earth."

"Lady Helena—"

"You will tell me all. Oh yes, you will. You have said too much or too little, now. I must hear "all" then I shall judge for myself. I may be in love—still, I am amenable to reason. If you can show me any just cause or impediment to my marriage I will give her up.

She looked at him doubtfully—wistfully.

"Would you do this, Victor? Would you have strength to give up the girl you love? My boy, my son, I don't want to be hard on you. I want to see you happy, Heaven knows, and yet——"

"I will be happy—only tell me the truth and let me judge for myself."

He was smiling—he was incredulous. Lady Helena's mountain, seen by his eyes, no doubt, would turn out the veriest molehill.

"I don't know what to do," she answered, in agitated tones. "I promised her to tell you if this day ever came, and now it is here and I—oh!" she cried out passionately, "I can't tell you!"

He grew pale himself, with fear of he knew not what.

"You can, you will—you must!" he said resolutely. "What terrible secret is there hidden behind all this?"

"Terrible secret—yes, that is it. Terrible secret—you have said it!"

"Do you, by any chance, refer to my mother's death? Is it that you knew all these years her murderer and have kept it secret?"

There was no reply. She covered her face with her hands and turned away.

"Am I right?" he persisted.

She rose to her feet, goaded, it seemed, by his persistent questioning into a sort of frenzy.

"Let me alone, Victor Catheron," she cried. "I have kept my secret for twenty-three years—do you think you will wring it from me all in a moment now? What right have you to question me—to say I shall tell, or shall not? If you knew all you would know you have no rights whatever—none—no right to ask any woman to share your life—no right, if it comes to that, even to the title you bear!"

He rose up, too—white to the lips. Was Lady Helena going mad? Had the announcement of his marriage turned her brain? In that pause, before either could speak again, a knock that had been twice given unheard, was repeated a third time. It brought both back instantly from the tragic to the decorum of every-day life. Lady Helena sat down; Sir Victor opened the door. It was a servant with a note on a salver.

"Well, sir," the baronet demanded abruptly. "What do you want?"

"It's her ladyship, Sir Victor. A lady to see your ladyship on very important business."

"I can see no one this morning," Lady Helena responded, "tell her so."

"My lady, excuse me; this lady said your ladyship would be sure to see her, if your ladyship would look at this note. Which this is the note, my lady."

Lady Helena's face lit up eagerly now. She tore open the note at once.

"You may go, Nixon," she said. "Show the lady up immediately."

She ran over the few brief lines the note contained, with a look of unutterable relief. Like the letter, it was signed "Inez."

"Victor," she said, turning to her nephew and holding out her hand, "forgive me, if in my excitement and haste I have said what I should not. Give me a little time, and everything will be explained. The coming of In—this lady—is the most opportune thing in the world. You shall be told all soon."

"I am to understand then," Sir Victor said coldly, "that this stranger, this mysterious lady, is in your confidence; that she is to be received into mine that she is to be consulted before you can tell me this secret which involves the happiness of my life?"

"Precisely! You look angry and incredulous, but soon you will understand. She is one of our family—more at present I cannot say. Go, Victor, trust me believe me, neither your honor nor your love shall suffer at our hands. Postpone the driving-party, or make my excuses; I shall not leave my rooms to-day."

He bowed coldly—annoyed, amazed, and went. What did all this mean? Up to the present, his life had flowed peacefully, almost sluggishly, without family secrets or mystifications of any kind. And now all at once here were secrets and mysteries cropping up. What was the wonderful secret—who was this mysterious lady. He must wait until to-morrow, it appeared, for the answer to both.

ed Nixon and a veiled lady in black ascending. He looked at her keenly—she was tall and slender; beyond that, through the heavy crape veil he could make out nothing. "Mysterious, certainly!" he thought. "I wonder who she is?" He bowed as he passed her; she bent her head in return; then he hastened to seek out Edith, and tell her an important visitor had arrived for Lady Helena, and that the excursion to Eastlake Abbey would be postponed. He was but a poor dissembler, and the girl's bright brown eyes were sharp. She smiled as she looked and listened.

"Did you know I could tell fortunes, Sir Victor? Hold out your hand and let me tell you the past. You have been upstairs with Lady Helena; you have told her that Edith Darrell has consented to be your wife. You have asked her sanction to the union, and have been naturally, indignantly, and peremptorily refused."

He smiled, but the conscious color rose.

"I always suspected you of being an enchantress—now I know it. Can you tell me the future as truthfully as the past?"

"In this instance I think so. 'You shall never marry a penniless nobody, sir. Your family is not to be disgraced by a low marriage. This girl, who is but a sort of upper servant hired and paid, in the family of these common rich American people, is no mate for a Catheron of Catheron. I refuse to listen to a word, sir—I insist upon this preposterous affair being given up.' You expostulate—in vain. And as constant dropping wears the most elaborate stone, so at last will her ladyship conquer. You will come to me one day and say: 'Look here, Miss Darrell, I'm awfully sorry, you know, but we've made a mistake—I've made a mistake. I return you your freedom—will you kindly give me back mine?"

He laughed. Only for an instant; then he was grave, almost reproachful.

"And you know me no better than this!" he said. "I take back my words; you are no seeress. I love my aunt very dearly, but not all the aunts on earth could part me from you."

"I don't know," Miss Darrell answered coolly; "it might be better for both of us. Oh, don't get angry, please—you know what I mean. I am a nobody, as your somebodies go on this side. My Grandfather Stuart was a peddlar once, I believe; my Grandfather Darrell, a schoolmaster. And I am Miss Stuart's paid companion and poor relation. Be wise, Sir Victor while there is time; be warned before it is too late. Sir Victor Catheron, let us shake hands and part."

She held it out to him with a smile, supremely careless and uplifted. He caught it passionately, his blue eyes afire, and covered it with kisses.

"Not for ten thousand worlds! O Edith, how lightly you talk of parting, of giving me up. Am I then so utterly indifferent to you? No; I will never resign you. Life can hold nothing half so bitter for me as the loss of you."

She listened in a sort of wonder at his impassioned earnestness, looking at him shyly, wistfully.

"You love me like this?" she said.

"A hundred times more than this. I would die for you, Edith."

She passed her hand through his arm and clasped the other round it, her bright smile back.

"I beg your pardon. I should not have asked."

"Yes, yes, you should. You shall visit it at once. I am a coward about some things, I confess—this among others. Come."

They went. He took from a huge bunch he carried, the key of that long-locked room. He flung it wide and they stood together on the threshold.

It was all dark, the blinds closed, the curtain drawn, dark and deserted, as it had been since that fatal night. Nothing had been changed, absolutely nothing. There stood the baby bassinet, there the little table on which the knife had lain, there beneath the open window the chair in which Ethel, Lady Catheron, had slept her last long sleep. A hush that seemed like the hush of death lay over all.

Edith stood silent and grave—not speaking. She motioned him hastily to come away. He obeyed. Another moment, and they stood together under the blue bright sky.

"Oh!" Edith said, under her breath, "who did it?"

"Who indeed? And yet Lady Helena knows."

His face and tone were sombre. How dare they let her lie in her unavenged grave? A Catheron had done it beyond doubt, and to save the Catheron name and honor the murderer had been let go.

"Lady Helena knows!" repeated Edith; "it was that wicked brother and sister, then? How cruel—how cruel!"

"It was not the sister—I believe that. It must have been the brother."

"Is he living or dead?"

Living, I believe. By Heaven! I have half a mind yet to hunt him down."

"An ancient name and family honor are wonderful things on this side of the Atlantic, a couple of million dollars on ours. They can save the murderer from the gallows. We won't talk about it, Sir Victor—it makes you unhappy I see; only if ever I—if ever I," laughing and blushing a little, "come to be mistress of that big, romantic old house, I shall wall that room up. It will always be a haunted chamber—a Bluebeard closet for me."

"If ever you are mistress," he repeated. "Edith, my dearest, when will you be?"

"Who knows? Never, perhaps."

"Edith—again!"

"Well who can tell. I may die—you may die—something may happen. I can't realize that I ever will be. I can't think of myself as Lady Catheron."

"Edith, I command you! Name the day."

"Now, my dear Sir Victor—"

"Dear Victor, without the prefix; let all formality end between us. Why need we wait? You are your own mistress, I am my own master; I am desperately in love—I want to be married. I will be married. There is nothing to wait for—I won't wait. Edith, shall it be—this is the last of May—shall it be the first week of July?"

"No, sir; it shall not, nor the first week of August. We don't do things in this desperate sort of hot haste."

"Little tyrant! if you cared for me one straw, you would not object like this."

"Yes I would. Nobody marries in this impetuous fashion. I won't hear of August. Besides, there is my engagement with Mrs. Stuart. I have promised to talk French and German all through the Continent for them this summer."

"I will furnish Mrs. Stuart a substitute with every European language at her finger ends. Seriously, Edith, my promised wife can be no one's paid companion. Pardon me, but you must see this, Edith."

"I see it," she answered, gravely. She had her own reasons for not wishing to accompany the Stuart family now. And after all, why should she insist on postponing the marriage?

"You are relenting—I see it in your face," he exclaimed, imploringly. "Edith! Edith! shall it be the first week of September?"

She smiled and looked at him as she had done early this eventful morning, when she had said "Yes!"

"As brain fever threatens if I refuse, I suppose you must have your way."

"Then it shall be the first of September—St. Partridge Day?"

"It shall be St. Partridge Day."

CHAPTER X.

Meantime the long sunny hours, that passed so pleasantly for these plighted lovers, lagged drearily enough for Beatrix Stuart.

She had sent for her mother and told her the news. Placid Aunt Chatty lifted her neck eyebrows and opened her dim eyes as she listened.

"Sir Victor Catheron going to marry our Edith! Dear me! I am sure I thought it was you, Trixy, all the time. And Edith will be a great lady after all. Dear me!"

That was all Mrs. Stuart had to say about it. She was a mild, placid, amiable woman, who had married her husband for love, and had been happy with him, and who had no ambitions for herself or her children. Trixy was the only one who had any, and Trixy was not her favorite child. Trixy was a trial, and Trixy's mother knew it.

Trixy's face was a study when she heard the news. She was sitting at the piano, and she turned round on the music-stool and looked at her mother, her face white with passion.

"Edith Darrell going to be married to Sir Victor Catheron! Mother, you are dreaming!"

"No, my dear, I am wide awake. Sir Victor has been here this morning, and has asked Edith to be his wife, and Edith has consented. I am very glad, for my part, that Edith is going to be so well married. Sir Victor is very rich, and very handsome, and very amiable, and Edith is a very lucky girl."

Trixy turned back to the piano, and struck a few angry chords. Her mother looked at her in surprise.

"I thought you liked Edith, Trixy?"

"I do like her. I am glad she is going to be married. I am glad she is going to be so well married. I am glad she is going to be a baronet's wife. I am glad she is going to be rich. I am glad she is going to be happy. I am glad she is going to be everything that is delightful. I am glad of it all, all, all!" striking the piano with each word.

"Then why are you in a rage, my dear?"

"Because I am a fool, mother. Because I am a fool, and a blind fool, and a conceited fool, and a vain fool, and a jealous fool, and a wicked fool, and a fool in every way. Because I am a fool, and have been a fool, and will be a fool, and I hate myself for a fool, and I hate Edith Darrell for a fool, and I hate Sir Victor Catheron for a fool, and I hate everybody for a fool, and I hate you for a fool, and I hate you for a fool, and I hate you for a fool!" striking the piano with each word.

"Trixy, my dear, you are mad!"

"I am mad, mother. I am mad, and and her own rare, lovely blush; "do better—live for me. Ah, Sir Victor, I don't think it will be such a very hard thing to learn to—like you!"

"My darling! And you will talk no more of parting—no more of giving me up? You don't really wish it, Edith, do you?"

"Most certainly not. Would I have accepted you, if I did? I'll never give you up while you care for me like this. If we ever part, the parting will be your doing, not mine."

"My doing—mine?" he laughed aloud in his incredulity and happiness. "The days of miracles are over, but a summer breeze could more easily uproot these oaks than that. And lest you should think yourself fetterless and free, I will bind you at once." He drew from his pocket a tiny morocco box. "See this ring, Edith; it has been worn by women of our house for the past two centuries—the betrothal ring of the Catherons. Let me place it on your finger, never to be taken off until I bind you with a golden circlet stronger still."

Her dark eyes sparkled as she looked at it. It was a solitaire diamond of wonderful size and brilliance, like a great drop of limpid water, set in dull red gold.

"There is some queer tradition extant about it," he said, "to the effect that the bride of a Catheron who does not wear it will lead a most unhappy life and die a most unhappy death. So, my dearest, you see how incumbent upon you it is for your own sake to wear it religiously."

He laughed, but she lifted to his, two deep, thoughtful, dark eyes.

"Did your mother wear it, Sir Victor?"

He started, the smile died from his face, his color faded.

"My mother?" he answered; "no. My father married her secretly and hastily after six weeks courtship, and of course never thought of the ring. 'Lead an unhappy life, die an unhappy death,'" he said, repeating his own words; "she did both, and, to the best of my belief, she never wore it."

"An odd coincidence, at least," said Edith, her eyes fixed on the diamond blazing in the sunshine on her hand.

"Don't let us talk about my mother," Sir Victor said; "there is always something so terrible to me in the memory of her death. Your life will be very different from hers—my poor mother."

"I hope so," was the grave reply; "and in my case there will be no jealous rival, will there? Sir Victor, do you know I should like to visit Catheron Royals. If we have had love-making enough for one day, suppose we walk over?"

"I shall never have love-making enough," he laughed. "I shall bore you awfully sometimes, I have no doubt; but when the heart is full, the lips must speak. As to walking—it is a long walk—do you think you can?"

"As I am to become a naturalized Englishwoman, the sooner I take to English habits the better. I shall at least make the attempt."

"And we can drive back in time for dinner. I shall be delighted to show you the old place—your future home, where we are to spend so many happy years."

They set off. It was a delightful walk, that sunny day, across fields, down fragrant green lanes, where the hedges in bloom made the air odorous, and the birds sang in the arching branches overhead.

With the yellow splendor of the afternoon sunlight gilding it, its tall trees waving, its gray turrets and towers piercing the amber air, its ivied walls, and talls stacks of chimneys, Catheron Royals came in view at last.

"Welcome to Catheron Royals—welcome as its mistress, my bride, my love," Sir Victor Catheron said.

She lifted her eyes—they were full of tears. How good he was—how tenderly he loved her, and what a happy, grateful girl she had reason to be. They entered the house, admitted by a very old woman, who bobbed a curtesy and looked at them with curious eyes.

Leaning on her lover's arm, Edith Darrell walked through scores of stately rooms, immense, chill halls, picture-galleries, drawing-rooms, and chambers. What a stupendous place it was—bigger and more imposing by far than Powyss Place, and over twice as old. She looked at the polished suits of armor, at battle-axes antlers, pikes, halberds, until her eyes ached.

"It's a wonderful place," she said; "a place to dream of—a place such as I have only met before in English books. But here is one room among all these rooms which you have not shown me, and which I have a morbid craving to see, You will not be angry if I ask?"

"Angry with you?" Sir Victor lifted his eyebrows in laughing surprise. "Speak, Edith, though it were half my kingdom."

"It is—" a pause—"to see the room where your mother—Ah!" as he shrank a serene quietude that exasperated her only daughter beyond bounds.

"I wonder if an earthquake would upset ma's equanimity!" thought Trix savagely. "Well, wait until Charley comes! We'll see how he takes it."

Charley and the captain had gone off exploring the wonders and antiquities of Chester. Edith and Sir Victor were nobody knew were.

The long, red spears of the sunset were piercing the green depths of fern and brake, when the two young men rode home. A servant waylaid Mr. Stuart and delivered his sister's message. She wanted to see him at once on important business.

"Important business!" muttered Charley, opening his eyes.

But he went promptly without waiting to change his dress.

"How do, Trix?" he said, sauntering in. "Captain Hammond's compliments, and how's the ankle?"

"Oh, the ankle's just the same—getting better, I suppose," Trix answered, rather crossly. "I didn't send for you to talk about my ankle."

"My dear Trix, a young lady's ankle is always a matter of profound interest and admiration to every well-regulated masculine mind."

"Bah! Charley, you'll never guess what I have to tell!"

"My child, I don't intend to try. If you have anything preying on your mind—and I see you have—out with it. Suspense is painful."

He closed his eyes, and calmly awaited the news. It came—like a bolt from a bow.

"Charley, Sir Victor Catheron has proposed to Edith, and Edith has accepted him!"

Charley opened his eyes, and fixed them upon her—not the faintest trace of surprise or any other earthly emotion upon his fatigued face.

"Ah—and that's your news! Poor child! After all your efforts, it's rather hard upon you. But if you expect me to be surprised, you do your only brother's penetration something less than justice. It has been an evident case of spoons—apparent to the dullest intellect from the first. I have long outlived the tender passion myself, but in others I always regard it with a fatherly—nay—let me say, even grandfatherly interest."

And this was all! And she had thought he was in love with Edith himself. It was too much for Trix.

"O Charley!" she burst forth, "you are such a fool!"

Mr. Stuart rose to his feet.

"Overpowered by the involuntary homage of this assembly, I rise to——"

"You're an idiot—there!" went on Trix; "a lazy, stupid idiot! You're in love with Edith yourself, and you could have had her if you wished, for she likes you better than Sir Victor, and then Sir Victor might have proposed to me. But no—you must go dawdling about, prowling, and prancing, and let her slip through your fingers!"

"Prowling and prancing! Good Heaven, Trix! I ask you soberly, as man to man, did you ever see me prowl or prance in the whole course of my life!"

"Bah-h-h!" said Trix, with a perfect shake of scorn in the interjection. "I've no patience with you! Get out of my room—do!"

Mr. Stuart, senior, was the only one who did not take it quietly. His bile rose at once.

"Edith! Edith Darrell! Fred. Darrell's penniless daughter! Beatrix Stuart, have you let this young baronet slip through your fingers in this ridiculous way after all?"

"I never let him slip—he never was in my fingers," retorted Trix, nearly crying. "It's just my usual luck. I don't want him—he's a stupid noodle—that's what he is. Edith's better-looking than I am. Any one can see that with half an eye, and when I was sick on that horrid ship, she had everything her own way."

"Well, there, there, child!" exclaimed Mr. Stuart, testily, for he was fond of Trix; "don't cry. There's as good fish in the sea as ever were caught. As to being better-looking than you, I don't believe a word of it. I never liked your dark complected women myself. There's this young fellow, Hammond—his father's a lord—rich, too, if his grandfather did make it cotton-spinning. Now, why can't you set your cap at him? Come downstairs, Trixy, and put on your stunningest gown, and see if you can't hook the military swell."

Following these parental counsels, Miss Trix did assume her "stunningest" gown, and with the aid of her brother and a crutch, managed to reach the dining-room. There Lady Helena, pale and preoccupied, joined them. No allusion was made at dinner to the topic—a visible restraint was upon all.

"Old lady don't half like it," chuckled eyes looked at her with brotherly frankness, nothing more.

The color that came so seldom, and made her so lovely, rose deep to Edith's cheeks—it is time the flush of anger. Her dark eyes gleamed scornfully; she drew her hand suddenly and contemptuously away.

"It is not necessary at all, Cousin Charlie. Pray don't trouble yourself—I know how you hate trouble—to turn fine phrases. I don't want congratulations; I am too happy to need them."

"Yet being the correct thing to do, and knowing what a stickler you are for les convenances, Edith, you will still permit me humbly to offer them. It is a most suitable match; I congratulate Sir Victor on his excellent taste and judgment. He is the best fellow alive, and you—I will say it though you are my cousin—will be a bride even a baronet may be proud of. I wish you both, all the happiness so suitable a match deserves."

Was this sarcasm—was it real? She could not tell, well as she understood him. His placid face, his serene eyes were as cloudless as a summer sky. Yes, he meant it, and only the other day he had told her he loved her. She could have laughed aloud—Charley Stuart's love!

On the instant Sir Victor returned. In his secret heart the baronet was mortally jealous of Charley. The love that Edith could not give him, he felt instinctively, had long ago been given to her handsome "THE NAPANEE EXPRESS of last week upholds the defeat of their hockey team by saying that they scored two goals which the referee would not allow, and also that they did not play the game they knew how to play. The first statement is false and was evidently inspired by a sore head. As to whether the team played their best game or not we are not prepared to state, but one thing is certain the Quinte's had the easiest thing they have struck thiswinter."—Belleville Intelligencer. The Intelligencer seems to be inspired with a profound ignorance of what it is talking about. F. S. Rockwell scored for Napanee on two different occasions during the game, putting the puck fairly and squarely through the goal, but the Belleville umpire would not allow it. These decisions were so glaringly unfair that they were noted and harshly commented upon by the crowd, and the referee informed the umpire if he did not act fairly he would rule him off. As regards the Intelligencer's last statement that "the Quinte's had the easiest thing they struck this winter" it is only necessary to point to the dishonest methods resorted to by the Quinte's umpire to refute this. The case must have been judged well nigh desperate when their umpire was reduced to such a strait. In conclusion we might say that it is a great stretch of the imagination to term the team that played Napanee at Belleville the Quintes. They were a picked team, simply that and nothing more, but, notwithstanding this, the result of the match would have been very differently had Napanee been awarded fair play.

The Scarlets

A meeting called for the purpose of organizing a foot ball club for the coming season was held at the Campbell House on Wednesday evening. There was a good attendance of lovers of the game and much interest evinced in the proceedings. The following officers were elected: President, Robert Tate; Hon. President, F. Chinneck; Vice President, J. F. McAlister; Hon. Vice President, Hugh Milling; Captain, W. B. Haines; Vice Captain, F. S. Scott; Secretary, M. B. McDonald; Treasurer, Herbert Ashley; Executive Committee, Frank Grieves, Clarence Trimble, Frank Lee, Walt Exley, William Meaghar and Perry Wagar; Custodian, James McCabe. The admission fee for membership in the club was fixed at 35 cents. Scarlet was the color adopted and the club was duly christened The Scarlets of Napanee. The next meeting of the club will be held in the Campbell House on the first Monday in April.

A Tobacco Company's Generosity.

The George E. Tuckett & Sons Tobacco Co., Ltd., of Hamilton, nine years ago instituted the commendable idea of presenting a deed of a building lot each Christmas to their oldest active employee. This year it was the good fortune of Mr. Thomas Milligan to succeed to the firm's generosity, he having been with them for 41 years. In addition to the lot he received a substantial cheque from the same source. The whole staff of the concern also came in for a gift, the day hands receiving an extra week's salary and the piece hands a good sized turkey. Some time ago the Messrs Tuckett turned their factory into a joint stock company, admitting many of the more important employees into partnership and this additional evidence of a desire to share with their men the prosperity of the house cannot help but bear fruit in increased energy and good will among all who are fortunate enough to be connected with the enterprising concern.

In Her Bloom.

Pathetic indeed are the circumstances surrounding the death of Maud Amelia Wagar, whose spirit winged its flight to the great Beyond on Friday morning last after a brief and painful illness of about eight days duration. Deceased was just budding out into the full bloom of womanhood when death overtook her. She was 15 years 5 months and 11 days of age. She had been attending the Collegiate Institute here and was an exceedingly bright, pretty girl, greatly beloved by her schoolmates and associates. About two weeks ago she contracted inflammation of the bowels, and although everthing possible was done to alleviate her sufferings and check the progress of the disease, she sank rapidly and steadily until the messenger summoned her on Friday morning last, at the residence of Mr. D. McLiver, Thomas street. Deceased was the daughter of Mr. J. D. Wagar, of Enterprise, and on the afternoon of the day of her death her remains were conveyed to her late home, which she left a short while before with high hopes and in the full vigor of health. A short funeral service was held at the residence of Mr. McLiver on Friday and the remains were then conveyed to the train accompanied by a large concourse of friends and the pupils of the Institute, who turned out in a body. The funeral took place on Monday to the Centreville vaults and was one of the largest ever wittnessed in that neighborhood. Mr. Henry, headmaster of the Collegiate, and a large number of the pupils attended to pay their last respects to a beloved associate. Her late schoolmates placed a handsome cross of natural flowers on her coffin. Six of the students of the Institute acted as pall bearers. The bereaved parents and friends have the sympathy of all in their deep affliction.

Two Operations

BOTH FAILURES

A Case of Kidney Complaint that would Not Yield to Surgery or Medicine until B. B. B. was Tried.

GENTLEMEN,—After having undergone two operations for Kidney Complaint without securing the least relief, and hearing of some remarkable cures made by B. B. B. in our neighborhood, I decided to try it. I was given up by the doctors after the operations failed, and it was providential that I heard of B. B. B. After the use of six bottles I experienced so great relief and so great a change for the better that I felt the good effects would be lasting, as indeed they have been. The seventh bottle perfectly cured me, and I am now stronger and better than I ever was before. People who saw me before I took B. B. B. and who see me now can scarcely believe that I am the same person.

Association announcing that he would visit Melrose on March 16th, said announcements were made in the different lodges two weeks previous. On the appointed evenings sleighs laden with sturdy yeomanry began at an early hour to arrive to catch another glimpse of their representative while the old party heelers with ears erect to catch an inkling of the purport of the meeting. Crowds began to enter the spacious hall, handing the password to the ushers, finding seating room as best they could. This continued until the hall was packed to the doors, many remaining standing. The crowd patiently waiting for their representative, who was discharging his duties as secretary of the Canadian Order of Home Circle. The impatience of the audience was rising to a high degree when Mr. McLaren and his associate speakers made their appearance and were greeted with a burst of applause from the assembled multitude. The president Mr. Bonnet took the chair, inviting the several speakers to the platform. In a neat and masterly address the president outlined the proceedure of the evening closing with the remark that Canada should be for the Canadians, for the masses and not entirely for the classes as it now is. The chairman introduced Mr Philips. The speaker on rising made the remark that Patronism was principle, the rule of honor, and concluded in eloquent terms by remarking that patronism would raise the despondent workers of Canada. W. H. Osborn was the next speaker, beginning with a rumbling voice owing to the contraction of a severe cold, but rising in eloquence as he depicted the deplorable condition of the masses of Canada, and in conclusion he eulogised in glowing terms the noble thirteen already in the Provincial Parliament. The chairman then introduced Mr. P. Randall, of Lonsdale, who was greeted with cheers from the audience. His stand was decisive, his eloquence and oratory was unparalled in the history of Patron speakers. Mr. McFarlen, T. P., secretary, was then called on, he, not knowing he was to address the audience, begged to be excused. The chairman then introduced Mr. McLaren, M. P. P, the speaker of the evening. On rising he was greeted with a great ovation from the audience. He held the audience spell bound for an hour disclosing the doings of Parliament, concluding his eloquent address by urging the electors of East Hastings to stand together in the next election and elect their Patron Canadate, as they had him with a handsome majority The hour growing late the chairman called for three cheers for the Queen, three cheers for McLaren and three cheers for Beleanquel, which were heartily responded to by the audience. On Monday Mr. McLaren, in company with Mr. John Kinney, delegate of the Home Circle, will proceed in cab to Shannonville, thence by train to Toronto to the seat of Government. PATRON.

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

TAMWORTH.

A very sad accident occurred on Wednesday evening, March 27th, which has cast a gloom over the whole community. Mr. Edward Corran, harness-maker, left his shop at six o'clock and went to his home to do his chores as usual. While watering his colt the animal got away from him and it is supposed he fell, and that as he fell the colt kicked him on the head inflicting a terrible wound. His skull was broken and the brain lacerated. It is not known exactly how it happened as no one saw the blow dealt. He was found a few minutes afterwards lying face down in the snow, his head bleeding profusely. Drs. Clark and Wilson were summoned and all that medical skill could do was done for him but without avail. He lingered until Sunday afternoon, when he passed quietly away. Deceased was 57 years of age and leaves a wife and three children, two sons and one daughter. He was a quiet, steady and industrious man and respected by all who knew him. The funeral which took place on Tuesday morning was one of the largest ever seen in this township. Rev. J. R. Serson conducted the burial services in Christ church. He was a member of the order of Workingmen and Select Knights. He also was a Mason, having first joined that order in Montreal from which place he came, when he came to live here. His last request was to be buried under the order of the Workingmen and a goodly number of the order turned out. All the members did not get the word. A few from Centreville lodge came. The family have the deep sympathy of all in their sad affliction.

FAIR VIEW.

What has become of the reporter of the last two or three weeks, I presume when our esteemed grower, grower of small fruit and garden sass, had the tip over and received such a pair of black eyes. "Oh Charley," it is a good thing you do not indulge in poor whiskey or stale beer, or the neighbors might talk you know. I see the correspondent of the Whig from "Fair View" must have been drinking sour sap from some neighboring bush to think they have the only place in the vicinity that has a fence around it and all the rest is open to commons.

The complaint laid before Police Magistrate Daly by the Rev. Mr. Sagar against Mr. Nelson Sharp for disturbing the religious meetings of the Free Methodists in the school house at Violet, on Sunday, March 17th, came up for a hearing last week, and the case has since been dismissed. Sharpe is the caretaker of the Violet school house and he had been authorized by a resolution of the school board to allow no public meetings in the building. On these instructions he ejected the preacher and his congregation from the school house on the 17th of March. The preacher laid a complaint against Sharpe for disturbing a religious meeting, and Sharpe retaliated by putting in a contrary charge of trespassing against Mr. Sager, with the result as stated.

The song service in the Eastern Methodist church last week was well attended and the services much appreciated.

DEAR SIRS,—During the winter of 1892-93, I was covered with Pimples on the inside of my right leg between the knee and the ankle. As I never had anything of the kind before I was anxious about it, and sought medical advice, but getting no relief from the doctor I tried a bottle of B.B.B., applying some of it to my leg as well as using it internally, and to my surprise the nasty disease, whatever it was, disappeared within three weeks, and I am thankful to say it has never re-appeared. IN THE SPRING TIME

PAINE'S CELERY COMPOUND MAKES PEOPLE WELL

Thankful People Everywhere Gladly Endorse the Great Medicine

It is a Blessing to the Whole Canadian Dominion.

PHYSICIANS ACKNOWLEDGE ITS GREAT CURING VIRTUES

IT MAKES STRONG NERVES AND PURE BLOOD.

It Cures Diseases and Long-standing Troubles.

An Ontario Man Strongly Testifies.

"I am a living witness to the worth of Paine's Celery Compound."

This is the statement of Mr. G. J. Smye of Sheffield, Ont.

It makes people well!

This fact is so widely known and so fully borne out by thousands of magnificent cures, that the simple statement is in itself sufficient.

The whole Dominion has been blessed by the marvellous work of the great medicine, and an army of rescued and saved men and women bless the noble discoverer, Prof. Edward E. Phelps, M. D., L. L. D.

Master minds amongst the medical men of the present day readily acknowledge the potent and curing virtues of Paine's Celery Compound. They find that it makes strong nerves and pure blood, two essentials necessary for perfect health and strength.

Long-standing troubles and diseases are cured by Paine's Celery Compound when all other medical agencies fail in their work. For kidney and liver troubles, it is the infallible remedy. Nervous debility, exhaustion, sleeplessness and headaches are quickly swept away by the curing powers of Paine's Celery Compound.

necessity, recuperate lost strength, and gain the healthfulness so necessary to make life pleasurable for the summer. All should bear in mind the fact that Paine's Celery Compound "makes people well."

The following letter from Mr. G. J. Smye, of Sheffield, Ont., speaks of a wonderous cure after all ordinary means had failed to do the work:—

"It is with great pleasure that I testfiy to the value of your great medicine, Paine's Celery Compound. For nearly two years I suffered from indigestion, kidney and liver troubles. After trying several medicines that did not effect a cure, I decided to try your Compound. Before using it I was so low in health that I could not eat or sleep. I could not lie in bed owing to pain in my back; it was only by resting on elbows and knees I was enabled to obtain a slight degree of ease. Before I had fully taken one bottle of your medicine I began to improve. I have in all taken fourteen bottles with grand results. I am a farmer and am now working every day. Anyone may refer to me in regard to those statements, or to any of my neighbors around Sheffield, where I am well known. I am a living witness to the worth of Paine's Celery

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, APRIL 5, 1895.

The Beaver's whine that our manufacturing industries cannot live without protection is as pitiful as it is false and demeaning to the workmen of Canada.

The Belleville Intelligencer on Monday informed its readers that "there is no duty on brains." Its subscribers, aged residenters and old friends of the family, are wondering why in thunder the editor of that paper doesn't take advantage of this laxity of the N. P. tariff and put in a stock.

By the statesmanlike conduct of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, the great Lord Highinkadink of the Bowell Ministry, a national catastrophe has been averted. He resigned his position in the Cabinet for three days, but we are pleased to inform our readers that he is again at his desk controlling the destinies of his beloved country, and drawing his salary of $8,000 a year as heretofore.

In reply to the question "Has the N. P. increased the standard of morality?" the Belleville Intelligencer doesn't "know what the increasing of the standard of morality may mean." The increasing of the standard of morality will mean a cessation of the boodling and corruption that has characterized the actions of the authors of the N. P. It will mean that the people of Canada will assert their manliness and repudiate with scorn the offer of a post office or any public works as a bribe for their votes. The introduction of the N. P. has had a degenerating influence on the people of Canada. It has fostered combines, and the controllers of these combines have contributed large sums of money to bribe and debauch the electorate, thereby securing the election of men who act as their factotums in Parliament and legislate in their interest and against the interests of the majority. The N. P. has rendered possible the election to Parliament of men who allowed such work as the Curran Bridge job, the Connolly-McGreevy peculations, and the thousand and one acts of corruption that has so lowered Canada in the estimation of outside nations. Raising the standard of morality in Canada means the abolition of the N.P. and the defeat of the present corrupt Government.

The duties on Yankee beef, pork, cheese oats, corn, and other products of the farm have been of enormous benefit to the farmer.—Belleville Intelligencer.

The above is part of the beautiful Tory home market fable that we hear so much about. It is not quite as glowing but every bit as reliable as the elder Tupper's rosy picture in the prehistoric days of the N. P. when in fervid eloquence he depicted how the N. P. was to cause tall chimneys to loom up in every village and township in the Dominion. The farmers were to be kept busy hauling produce to feed the teeming millions engaged in the factories which these tall chimneys surmounted. It was a pretty picture, but it lacked one thing to make it complete—the tall chimneys failed to materialize. The home mar-

A POST CARD.

To the Editor of THE EXPRESS.

Dear Sir,—From an unknown source I have received a post card containing the following, which is well worth a wider circulation than post cards to "five" as the writer suggests:

"In the name of our common country send a copy of the following to five of your friends, as I have done, repeating this request.

"The possible extension of other industries besides agriculture is due to the success with which agriculture itself is practised. * * * It is only as the art of agriculture is exercised with increasing effect that the number of those not so engaged can be increased.'—J. E. T. Rogers, Preface to 'Wealth of Nations.'

Experience teaches that Protection discourages agriculture, even where land is free and plentiful as in Canada. From 1881 to 1891 the number of farmers in Canada decreased 7000. During the same period the population of towns increased 38 per cent., hence the depression. Farm land values appreciated down to 1879, the year protection was introduced, since then they have fallen in value 40 per cent.

"Had human institutions therefore never disturbed the natural course of things the progressive wealth and increase of the towns would in every political society be consequential and in proportion to the improvement and cultivation of the territory or country."—Adam Smith.

Protection is the "human institution" referred to here. A revenue tariff when in force in Canada did not "disturb the natural course of things." A return to a revenue tariff would therefore restore farm land values, encourage the extension of agriculture, and widen the home and foreign market for the products and manufactures natural to the country."

The above, Mr. Editor, was all on one post card, and if the unknown writer of it is not a Patron of Industry he is evidently good enough for one. Let the press pass on his extracts from Rogers and Adam Smith and his comments thereon. Yours, etc.,

ALLEN PRINGLE.

A Good Thing is Always Desirable.

So it is with the visits of Prof. Dorenwend to Napanee. On his last visit he was so busy that many ladies and gentlemen were unable to be attended to. He is therefore returning to give all who desire it another opportunity of procuring his art goods for the head. Prof Dorenwend is undoubtedly one of the leaders of his profession on this continent—his skill in arranging the coverings for the head is well known. His goods are acknowledged to be perfect and in every way true to nature. They are the best protection to the head besides giving a refined and youthful expression to the face. Call and examine these marvels of his art and have them fitted in order to judge of the effect. Consult him about your hair, he will, free of charge, give you advice as to the preservation of it. He will be at the Paisley House on Wednesday 10th April, 1895.

Wanted at once. Choice Potatoes, Apples and Onions, for which I am paying highest market prices. W. C. Bruton.

ABSTRACT STATEMENT
—OF—
INCOME AND EXPENDITURE —OF THE—
TOWN OF NAPANEE
FOR THE YEAR ENDING 31st DECEMBER, 1894.

To the Municipal Council of the Town of Napanee

We, your Auditors, beg to submit the following report :

We have gone carefully over the books of the Town Treasurer for the year 1894, and find them correct, with vouchers and authority for all payments made, and have examined and verified, as far as possible, the amounts received by him.

We have carefully examined the items of receipts and expenditures by the Secy.-Treas. of the Board of Education and find them correct. We find in the case of each of these officers that the amount shown by their books to be on hand on the 1st of Jan. was at their credit in the Merchants Bank of Canada here.

We beg to hand you the following statements : detailed statement of the Debenture Debt Dec. 31st, 1894 ; statement of Assets and Liabilities of the town Dec. 31st 1894 ; detailed statement of Receipts and Expenditures by Treasurer ; abstract statement of Receipts and Expenditures by Treasurer ; detailed statement of Receipts and Expenditures on account of Collegiate Institute ; abstract statement of Receipts and Expenditures on account of Collegiate Institute ; detailed statement of Receipts and Expenditures on account of Public Schools ; abstract statement of Receipts and Expenditure on account of Pub. Schools

We beg to hand you a memo received from the Town Solicitor of the Securities held by the town as security for the due performance by the Treasurer of his duties as Treasurer of the town, and we consider the town is amply secured.

Since the first of Jan. the late Secy.-Treas. of the Board of Education, Mr. C. J. Curlette, has tendered his resignation, which has been accepted, and Mr. W. F. Hall has been appointed as his successor and is now performing the duties of the office, but his bonds are not complete, although in course of preparation, and we are therefore unable to report upon them. All of which is respectfully submitted.

ket likewise exists but in the imagination. The Canadian farmer receives an alleged protection against the American by certain duties on cereals. The N. P. puts a duty of 10 c. a bushel on peas, 10 c. a bushel on rye, 15 c. a bushel on barley, 7½ per bushel on Indian corn and 15 c. per bushel on wheat. And it is claimed by Tory stumpers that by these duties the home market is reserved for the farmers at an enhanced price. Now if by this protection a larger amount of our own cereals are consumed here, it does not prove that this is any advantage to the Canadian farmer. The farmer does not get a higher price for the wheat consumed in Canada. The farmer knows from his own experience that he does not get two prices for his wheat, one price for that intended for home consumption, and another for that intended for export, so, therefore, it is a matter of supreme indifference to him whether his wheat is consumed at home or abroad. The price of grain is fixed at Liverpool, and no matter if our duty was $10 instead of 10 c. it would not affect the price of it. The farmer is weary of this home market pusiness.

Our esteemed contemporary the Beaver in a loyal attempt to discredit the free trade policy of Britain that has made her prosperous and powerful publishes a few statements that are as misleading as they are misapplicable to the political situation in Canada. No one who has not lived in England can fully understand the significance of some of the taxes imposed, and the conditions there and here are so entirely different that comparsions are out of the question. When the Beaver says that in England a special tax of $3 75 is imposed for each male servant employed it betrays a profound and sublime ignorance of what it is talking about. A tax of this nature is imposed on the nobility or gentry who keep footmen, who are allowed the privilege of powdering their hair. It was put on we believe at the instignation of the nobility themselves, who desired their servants to have a certain distinctiveness or caste above the common herd. As to the other taxes mentioned they are perfectly justifiable in that country and are paid not by the poor but by the rich. The special taxes in England are so designed as to fall on the rich and not on the poor. The luxuries of the rich are taxed for the benefit of the poor. But this has no application to Canada. The deficit in the revenue in Canada that may occur in a change from a high protective tariff to a revenue tariff will not be met not by a tax on guns, carriages, dogs, male servants, etc., but by rigid economy in every department of the public service, the cessation of boodling the lopping off of the supperannuation allowance to men well able to work, (in fact one of these men, Judge Clark, drawing a superannuation allowance of $1500 from the Dominion Government, receives a yearly salary as solicitor for the C. P.R. of $15,000,) and the stoppage of all unnecessary drains on our resources. With a tariff for revenue policy it will be more difficult to raise a revenue, and if it is difficult to raise a revenue it will be difficult to spend it, and this of itself will insure economy.

NOTES ABOUT WOMEN.

The training given in schools and colleges is not the only evidence of physical growth of the American young woman. The numerous athletic clubs belonging wholly or in part to women are the best proof that they are turning their attention to vigorous, healthful exercise. There is not a popular sport, with the exception of baseball and football, in which the young women do not indulge. Racket, lawn tennis, fencing, bowling, horseback riding, rowing, bicycling, fox hunting and other sports that were once restricted to men are all freely followed by young women, and with a zest that shows how keenly they are enjoyed. The interest displayed in horse-shows is another evidence of the relish American young women have in outdoor sports. All these facts, and many others showing that the American girl is not the pallid hot-house flower she once was should be known to every one who attempts to speak on the matter.

A writer in an English magazine recently said on this subject: "Outdoor life, delight in action, the spirit of sport have taken hold of American womanhood. Girls of strong, active physique, erect carriage and energetic spirit, delighting in tennis, riding, boating, walking are now the rule. The feeble, indoor do-nothing is the exception, and the result is a tall, vigorous race with free steps and cheeks aglow with the ruddy color of physical health and energy. Walk along the avenue of New York, Boston, Chicago or any large city at the fashionable hours, and the procession of bright animated girlhood which passes before one's eyes gives ample proof of summer activity in the country and city work in gymnasium and riding-school."

The thoroughbred girl has carried off all the honors this season. In some cases she has been rich, and in others poor, but always simple, unaffected, wholesome and sensible. She has received attention as her due, and cannot be said to have lifted a finger from first to last to attract it. She took her place in society with serene dignity and amiability. She was just as nice to the humble as to the great. She has shown none of the petty jealousy peculiar to underbred and overdressed women. All the men agree that she is as nice as she is refined, and add: "Such a lady!" She is a charming illustration of the fact that a girl's suc-

TOWN COUNCIL.

Council Chamber.
April 1st, 1895.

Council met in regular session, Mayor Stevens in the chair, present Symington, Burns, Carson, Miller, McAlister, Lowry, Alexander, Ward, Madole.

Minutes of last regular meeting read and confirmed.

A communication received by the Mayor from the Guelph Pavement Co., setting out the Co's. advanced facilties for putting down permanent cement pavement, was read and ordered to be placed in the hands of the Street committee, and the clerk instructed to communicate with the Co. re prices, etc.

A communication from Hines & Bond, of Watertown, in reply to a letter from the clerk, was read, stating that the stockholders were prepared to hand over to the town of Napanee the stock of the Water Works Co. for $9,000, subject to the mortgage on the Works. The communication was laid on the table till a later stage in the evening.

A petition from C. P. Ham asking to have his taxes remitted was on motion referred to the court of revision.

On motion the communication re the taking over of the Waterworks was referred to the Fire, Water and Light committee to report.

The Treasurer's monthly statement, showing the amount to the credit of the corporation to be $1873,08, was read and ordered to filed.

The following is the standing of the various committees.

	Approp.	Expend.	Bal.
Streets	$2550 00	$2433 95	$ 116 05

Contingent	565 35	258 85	306 50

The special committee appointed to reorganize the Fire Brigade presented its report.

On motion the report was taken up clause by clause,

Clause 1, recommending that further time be granted the committee to procure uniforms, was adopted.

Clause 2, recommending that the Brigade be disbanded, was on motion of Ward and Madole amended to read that the Brigade be disbanded at such a date as may be determined by this council.

Clause 3, recommending that a new Brigade be formed to be composed of 22 members, was on motion of Carson and Millar amended to read 20 members.

4, recommending that the council pass the new Brigade the usual annual grant of $300, was on motion of McAlister and Carson amended to read that each member of the Brigade be given a salary at the rate of $15 per annum.

Clause 5, recommending that we your committee be and are hereby appointed a committee to keep the Brigade up to the standard of 20 members and to supervise and fill any vacancies that may occur from death or other causes. Adopted.

Clause 6, recommending the appointment of the 20 gentlemen whose names were submitted, was taken up name by name.

The following men were appointed members of the new Fire Brigade: Seymour Lindsay, Richard Dinner, J. W. Sproule, Wm. Hall, Harry Hunter, Egerton McCabe, George Lewis, S. Meeks, Arthur Briggs, J. W. Harris, Jos. Bennett, J. Robinson, Charles Vanalstine, Thos. Oliver, David Frisken. The following names were deferred for consideration: Jos. Woodcock, has resided here 34 years.

David Card, came here from Camden township, has lived here 17 years.

James Parks, came from Prince Edward County, has lived here 10 years.

Wm. King came here from Deseronto about a year ago.

Mrs. Orvie Lyn was born here and has resided in Napanee all her life.

Polly Elliot, came here from England, has lived in Napanee 25 years.

Wm. Griffin has been 9 years in Napanee.

James Baldwin has resided here since birth, 70 years ago.

Mrs. Dowling was sent here from Newburgh under arrest last summer.

James Beck, somewhat of a wanderer, has lived here 7 years.

The report of the Police committee was read and adopted.

$40 was ordered to be placed in the hands of the Poor and Sanitary committee

The Fire, Water and Light committee were instructed to secure the necessary information re the proposed new fire alarm system, etc., and report at the next meeting of the council.

On motion the grant of $1 a week to Mr. Card was ordered to be continued.

Coun. Madole retired.

Moved by Symington and Leonard that the use of the council chamber be granted the Horticultural Society to hold its general meetings in, with the understanding that the Society pay the usual fee to the janitor and 50 cents a night for light and heating. The Mayor declared the motion carried, Coun. Alexander refraining from voting.

Coun. Burns called for the yeas and nays. Yeas, Leonard, Stevens, Symington, Lowry, Ward—5. Nays, Alexander, Carson, Millar, McAlister, Burns—5.

Coun. Ward desired to know the wish of the council in regard to his by-law re side walks, introduced at a former meeting.

Moved by Leonard and McAlister that the council consider the by-law at the next regular meeting. Carried.

Coun. Burns brought up the matter of the infringement of the butchers license by-law, and desired to know who was to prosecute such infringements. He had interviewed the town solicitor on the subject but Mr. Morden had declined to answer the question, as it was not part of his duties as town solicitor to give such advice. McAlister and Burns introduced a motion that the council secure the opinion of Herrington & Warner as to the validity of the by-law and who should prosecute infringers of it. After considerable discussion the matter was disposed of as follows;

That the following question be submitted to the town solicitor for his written opinion: If the licensee for the sale of fresh meat claims that parties are selling fresh meat without a license and contrary to the by-law, whose duty is it to prosecute said parties, the chief of police for the town, or the licensee?

The thoroughbred girl who has the advantage of money has, of course, greater opportunities of doing nice, kind things than she would have when poor; but it is always within her power to make herself an admired and lovable personality, rich or poor.

WOMEN OF TO-DAY

The oldest woman in North Carolina is said to be Mrs. Catherine Beshears. Her exact age is not known, but it is supposed to be between 115 and 120 years.

Ouida never shakes hands. She declares it to be the most vulgar form of salutation. As soon as she enters a room she makes for a seat. Once seated she will not budge until she takes her leave.

A New York widow, in looking over her late husband's effects, found an old savings fund book having but a single deposit for $5, dated 1820. She laid claim to the money, and, to her surprise, found that the principal and accumulated interest amounted to $248.

FASHION NOTES.

What to wear about her neck is the all-important question to the girl of fashion. She appreciates the importance of dressing her neck becomingly, and is, therefore, giving the subject much thought. The shops are helping her to solve the problem with the array of dainty neck adornments they are now displaying.

The flower boa is, perhaps, the latest novelty. It is made of flowers which seem almost fragrant in their naturalness. The boa of sweet peas is an exquisite fancy. The sweet pea blossoms are in varying shades of pinkish white and violet. They are fastened to a foundation of periwinkle satin ribbon, which is arranged at the side in dashing loops to give a stole effect.

Flower boas of buttercups mounted on black ribbon are effective, worn with a black gown and a little toque of black velvet and buttercups to match. The boa of mignonette, with knots of baby blue velvet here and there and fastened in front with a big velvet bow is another novelty. High plaitings of ribbon caught with clusters of tiny flowers make a fetching boa to wear with a spring gown.

A ruche of lace combined with flowers is another new fancy. Full-blown roses and poppies are the flowers most used for these boas. Many of the new boas have the stole effect which is generally produced by jewelled ribbon or sometimes two fluffy scarfs of chiffon fall well over the gown.

With these pretty caprices a woman can make the plainest frock presentable, and enliven a morning costume so that it could never be told from one especially devised for the theatre or other occasions of ceremony.

A TERRIBLE SECRET.

CHAPTER XIII.

The middle of the day is past before one by one they straggle down. Breakfast awaits each new comer, hot and tempting. Trix eats hers with a relish, but Edith looks fagged and spiritless. If people are to be supernaturally brilliant and bright, dashing and fascinating all night long, people must expect to pay the penalty next day, when lassitude and reaction set in.

"My poor Edie!" Mr. Charles Stuart remarks, "you do look most awfully used up. What a pity for their peace of mind, some of your frantic adorers of last night can't see you now. Let me recommend you to go back to bed and try an S. and B."

"An 'S. and B.'?" Edith repeats vaguely.

"Soda and Braudy. It's the thing, depend upon it, for such a case as yours. I've been seedy myself before now, and know what I'm talking about. I'll mix it for you, if you like."

There is a copy of Tennyson, in blue and gold, beside Miss Darrell, and Miss Darrell's reply is to fling it at Mr. Stuart's head. It is a last effort of expiring nature; she sinks back exhausted among her cushions. Charley departs to enjoy his Manilla out under the waving trees, and Sir Victor, looking fresh and recuperated, strolls in and bends over her.

"My dear Edith," he says, "how pale you are this morning—how tired you look. If one ball is going to exhaust you like this, how will you stand the wear and tear of London seasons in the blissful time to come?"

"I will grow used to it, I dare say. 'Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.'"

He smiles and bends lower, drawing one long brown silken tress of hair fondly through his fingers, feeling as though he would like to stoop and kiss the pale, weary face. But Trix is over yonder, pretending to read, and kissing is not to be thought of.

"I am going over to Catheron Royals," he whispered; "suppose you come—the walk will do you good. I am giving orders about the fitting up of the old place. Did I tell you the workmen came yesterday?"

"Yes; you told me."

"Shall I ring for your hat and parasol? Do come, Edith."

"Excuse me, Sir Victor," Edith answers, with an impatient motion. "I feel too tired—too lazy, which ever you like—to stir. Some other day I will go with pleasure."

He turns to leave her with a disappointed face. Edith closes her eyes and takes an easier position among the pillows. The door closes behind him; Trix flings down her book and bursts forth:

"Of all the heartless, cold-blooded animals, it has ever been my good fortune to meet, commend me to Edith Darrell!"

The dark eyes unclose and look up at her.

"My dear Trix! what's the matter with you now? What new enormity have I committed?"

"Oh, nothing new—nothing new at all," is Trixy's scornful response; "it is quite in keeping with the rest of your conduct. To be purely and entirely selfish is the normal state of the future Lady Catheron! Poor Sir Victor! who has won you. Poor Charley! who has lost you. I hardly know which I pity most."

"I don't see that you need waste your precious pity on either," answered Edith, perfectly unmoved by Miss Stuart's vituperation; "keep it for me. I shall make Sir Victor a very good wife as wives go, and for Charley—well, Lady Gwendoline is left to console him."

"Yes, of course, there is Lady Gwendoline. O Edith! Edith! what are you made of? How can you sell yourself as you are going to do? Sir Victor Catheron is no more to you than his ball-porter. You love my brother and yet you hand him over to Lady Gwendoline. Come, Edith, be honest for once; you love Charley, don't you?"

"It is rather late in the day for such tender confessions as that," Edith replies, with a reckless sort of laugh; "but yes—if the declaration does you any good, Trix—I love Charley."

"And you give him up! Miss Darrell I give you up as a conundrum I can't solve. Rank and title are all very well—nobody thinks more of them than I do; but if I loved a man," cried Trix, with kindling eyes and glowing cheeks. "I'd marry him! Yes, I would, though he were a beggar."

Edith looked up at her kindly with a smothered sigh.

"I believe you, Trix; but then you are different from me." She half raised herself, looking dreamily out on the sunlit prospect sell better. I am what you call me—a selfish wretch—a heartless little brute—and I am going to marry Sir Victor Catheron. Pity him, if you like, poor fellow! for he loves me with his whole heart, and he is a brave and loyal gentleman. But don't pity your brother, my dear; believe me, he doesn't need it. He's a good fellow, Charley, and he likes me, but he won't break his heart or commit suicide while he has a cigar left."

"Here he comes!" exclaimed Trix, "and I believe he has heard us."

"Let him come," Edith returns, lying listlessly back among her cushions once more. "It doesn't matter if he has. It will be no news to him."

"It is a pity you should miss each other, though," Trix says sarcastically, as she turns to go; "such thorough philosophers both; I believe you were made for each other, and, as far as easy-going selfishness is concerned, there is little to choose between you. It's a thousand pities Sir Victor can't hear all this."

"He might if he liked," is Edith's answer. "I shouldn't care. Charley!" as Charley comes in and Trix goes out, "have you been eavesdropping?"

"I have been eavesdropping—I never deny my small vices. Hammond left me to go to the stables, and, strolling under the window, I overheard you and Trix. Open confession is beneficial, no doubt; but, my dear cousin, you really shouldn't make it in so audible a tone. It might have been Sir Victor instead of me. Poor Sir Victor! he loves you — not a doubt of that, Dithy—to the depths of idiocy, where you know so well how to cast your victims; but hard hit as he is, I wonder what he would say if he heard all this!"

"You might tell him, Charley," Edith says. "I shouldn't mind much, and he might jilt me—who can tell? I think it would do us both good."

"I don't understand you, Edith," he says. "I feel like asking you the same question Trix did. Why do you marry Sir Victor?"

"Why do I marry him?" she repeated. "Well—a little because of his handsome face and stately bearing, and the triumph of carrying off a prize, for which Lady Gwendoline and half a score more have battled. A little because he pleads so eloquently, and loves me as no other mortal man did, or ever will; and oh! Charley, a great deal because he is Sir Victor Catheron of Catheron Royals, with a rent-roll of twenty thousand a year. I like him—who could help it; but love him—no!" She clasped her hands above her head, and gazed dreamily out at the sparkling sunlit scene. "I shall be very fond of him, very proud of him, when I am his wife—that I know. And on my wedding day, or perhaps a day or two before, you and I shall shake hands, sir, and see each other no more."

"No more?" he repeats.

"Well, for a year or two at least, until all the folly of the past can be remembered only as a thing to be laughed at. Or until there is a tall, handsome Mrs. Stuart, or, more likely, a Lady Gwendoline Stuart. And Charley," speaking hurriedly now, and not meeting the deep gray eyes she knows are fixed upon her, "the locket with my picture and the letters—you won't want them then—suppose you let me have them back."

"I won't want them then, certainly," Charley responds, "if by 'then' you mean when I am the husband of the tall, fascinating Mrs. Stuart or Lady Gwendoline. But as I have not that happiness yet, suppose you allow me to retain them until I have. Sir Victor will never know, and he would not mind much if he did. We are cousins, are we not? and what more natural than that cousins once removed should keep each other's pictures? By the bye, I see you still wear that little trumpery pearl and turquoise brooch I gave you, with my photo at the back. Give it to me, Edie; turquoise does not become your brown skin, my dear, and I'll give you a ruby pin with Sir Victor's instead."

He stretched out his hand to unfasten it. She sprang back, her cheeks flushing at his touch.

"You shall not have it! Married or single, I shall keep it to my dying day if I choose. Charley—what do you mean, sir! How dare you? Let me go!"

For he had risen suddenly and caught her in his arms, looking steadily down into her dark eyes, with a gaze she could not meet. Whilst he held her, whilst he looked at her, he was her master, and he knew it.

"Charley, let me go!" she pleaded. "If any one came in; the servants, or—or—Sir Victor."

He laughed contemptuously, and held her still.

"Yes, Edith; suppose Sir Victor came in and saw his bride-elect with a sacrilegious arm about her waist? Suppose I told him the truth—that you are mine, not his; mine by the love that alone makes marriage holy; his for his title and his rent-roll—bought and sold. By Heaven! I half wish he would!"

Was this Charley—Charley Stuart?

She caught her breath—her pride and her insolence dropping from her—only a girl in the grasp of the man she loves. In that moment, if he had willed it, he could have made her forego her plight, and pledge herself to him wholly, and he knew it.

"Edith" he said, "as I stand and look at you, in your beauty and your selfishness, I could hardly know whether I love or despise you most. I could make you marry me—make you, mind—but you are not worth it. Go!" He opened his arms contemptuously and released her. "You'll not be a bad wife for Sir Victor, I dare say, as fashionable wives go. You'll be that ornament of society, a married flirt, but you'll never run away with his dearest friend, and make a case for the D. C. A week ago I envied Sir Victor with all my heart—today I pity him with all my soul!"

He turned to go, for once in his life, thoroughly aroused, passionate love, passionate rage at war within him. She had sunk back upon the sofa, her face hidden in her hands, humbled, as in all her proud life she had never been humbled before. Her silence, her humility touched him. He heard a stifled sob, and all his hot anger died out in pained remorse.

"Oh, forgive me, Edith!" he said, "forgive me. It may be cruel, but I had to speak. It is the first, it will be the last time. I am selfish, too, or I would never have pained you—better never hear the truth than that the hearing should make you miserable. Don't cry, Edith; I can't bear it. Forgive me, my cousin—they are the last tears I will ever make you shed."

The words he meant to soothe her, hurt more deeply than the words he meant to wound. "They are the last tears I will ever make you shed!" An eternal farewell was in the words. She heard the door open, heard it close, and knew that her love and her life had parted in that instant forever.

CHAPTER XIV.

Two weeks later five of Lady Helena's guests departed. The Stuart family, with the devoted Captain Hammond in Trixy's train, went up to London; Miss Edith Darrell stayed behind.

Since the memorable day following the ball, the bride-elect of Sir Victor Catheron had dwelt in a sort of earthly purgatory. She had given up Charley—had cast him off, had bartered herself in cold blood—for a title and an income. And now that he held her at her true value, that his love had died a natural death in contempt and scorn, her whole soul craved him with a sick longing that was like death. Jealousy had been added to her other torments; he was ever by Lady Gwendoline's side of late—ever at Drexel Court. His father had set his heart upon the match; she was graceful and high-bred; it would end in a marriage, no doubt.

"What a dog in the manger I grow," she said, with a bitter laugh. "I won't have him myself, and I cannot bear that any one else should have him."

She was losing flesh and color, waxing wan as a shadow. Sir Victor was full of concern, full of wonder and alarm.

"The sooner my guests go, the better," thought Lady Helena. "The sooner she sees the last of this young man, the sooner health and strength will return."

Perhaps Charley saw too. It was he, at all events, who urged the modus to London.

"Let us see a little London life in the season, governor," he said. "Lady Portia Hampton, and that lot, are going. They'll introduce us to some nice people—so will Hammond. I pine for stone and mortar, and the fog and smoke of London."

Whatever he may have felt, he bore it easily to all outward seeming, as the men who feel deepest mostly do. He could not be said to actually avoid her, but certainly since that afternoon in the drawing-room, they had never been for five seconds alone.

"And, my dear child," said Lady Helena to Edith, when the departure was fixed, "I think you had much better remain behind."

There was a emphasis in her tone, a meaning glance in her eye, that brought the conscious blood to the girl's eyes ell—her lips quivered for an instant—she ade no reply.

"Certainly Edith will remain," Sir Victor interposed impetuously. "As if we ould survive dowh here without her!"

"It is settled, then?" said Lady Helena gain, watching Edith with a curiously inent look. "You remain?"

"I will remain," Edith answered, very owly and without lifting her eyes.

"My own idea is," went on the young aronet confidentially, to his lady love, 'that they are glad to be gone. Something eems to be the matter with Stuart pere—nder a cloud, rather, just at present. Has t struck you, Dithy?"

He had caught the way of calling her by he pet name Trix and Charley used. She ifted her eyes abstractedly now, as he ask-d the question.

"Mr. Stuart? What did you say, Sir Victor? Oh—under a cloud. Well, yes, have noticed it. I think it is something onnected with his business in New York. n papa's last letter he alluded to it."

"In papa's last letter," Mr. Frederick Darrell had said this:

"One of their great financial crises, they ell me, is approaching in New York, inolving many failures. One of the most deeply involved, it is whispered, will be James Stuart. I have heard he is threatned with ruin. Let us hope, however, his may be exaggerated. Once I fancied t would be a fine thing, a brilliant match, f my Edith married James Stuart's son. How much better Providence has arranged t! Once more, my dearest daughter, I ongratulate you on the brilliant vista pening before you. Your step-mather, who esires her best love, never wearies of preading the wonderful news that our litle Edie is so soon to be the bride of a great English baronet."

Miss Darrell's straight black brows met n one frowning line as she perused this parental and pious epistle. The next instand it was torn into minute atoms, and scattered to the four winds of heaven.

There seemed to be some foundation for the news. Letters without end kept coming for Mr. Stuart; little boys bearing the ominous orange envelopes of the telegraph company, came almost daily to Powyss Place. After these letters and cable messages the gloom on Mr. Stuart's face deepened and darkened. What was it? His family noticed it, and inquired about his health. He rebuffed them impatiently; he was quite well—he wanted to be left alone.

The time of departure was fixed at length; and the moment it was fixed, Trix flew upstairs, and into Edith's room, with the news.

"Oh, let us be joyful," sang Miss Stuart, waltzing in psalm time up and down the room; "we're off at last, the day after tomorrow, Dithy; so go pack up at once. Our rooms are taken at Langham's, Edie, and that blessed darling, Captain Hammond, goes with us. Lady Portia, Lady Gwendoline, and Lady Laura are coming also, and I mean to plunge headlong into the giddy whirl of dissipation, and mingle with the bloated aristocracy. Why don't you laugh? What are you looking so sulky about?"

"Am I looking sulky?" Edith said, with a faint smile. "I don't feel sulky. I

Street that evening. Calling upon old friends kept the gallant captain of Scotch Grays occupied all day; and as the shades of evening began to gather over the West End he stood impatiently awaiting his arrival. Mr. Stuart was ten minutes late, and if there was one thing in this mortal life that upset the young warrior's equanimity, it was being kept ten minutes waiting for his dinner. Five minutes more! Confound the fellow—would he never come? As the impatient adjuration passed the captain's lips, Charley came in. He was rather pale. Except for that, there was no change in him. Death itself could hardly have wrought much change in Charley. He had not come to apologize; he had not come to dine. He had come to tell the captain some very bad news. There had been terrible commercial disasters of late in New York; they had involved his father. This morning he had received a cable message, telling him the crash had come. He was irretrievably, past all redemption, ruined.

Captain Hammond, smoking a cigar, listened in gloomy silence, feeling particularly uncomfortable, and not knowing in the least what to say. He took out his cheroot and spoke at last.

"It's a deuced bad state of affairs, Charley. Have you thought of anything?"

"I've thought of suicide," Charley answered, "and made all the preliminary arrangements. I took out my razor-case, examined the edges, and found the sharpest, and—put it carefully away again."

"How did your mother and sister take it?" Captain Hammond gloomily asked.

"My mother is one of those happy-go-lucky, apathetic sort of people who never break their hearts over anything. She said, 'O dear me!' several times, I believe, and cried a little. Trix hasn't time to 'take it' at all. She is absorbed all day in attending her father. The fit turns out not to be dangerous at present, but he lies in a sort of stupor. Of course our first step will be to return to New York immediately. I called this afternoon upon the London agent of the Cunard ships, and found that one sails in four days. Providentially two cabins remained untaken; I secured them at once. In four days, then, we sail. Meantime, old fellow, if you'll drop in and speak a word to mother and Trix, you will be doing a friendly deed. Poor souls! they are awfully cut up."

Captain Hammond started to his feet. He seized Charley's hand in a grip of iron. "Old boy!" he began—he never got further. The torrent of eloquence dried up suddenly, and a shake of the hand that made Charley wince and finished the sentence.

"I shall be fully occupied in the meantime," Charley said, taking his hat and turning to go, "and they'll be a great deal alone. If I can find time I'll run down to Cheshire, and tell my cousin. As we may not meet again, I should like to say 'good by.'" He departed.

There was no sleep that night in the Stuart apartments. Mr. Stuart was pronounced out of danger and able to travel, but he still lay in that lethargic trance—not speaking at all, and seemingly not suffering. Next day Charley started for Cheshire.

"She doesn't deserve it," his sister said bitterly; "I wouldn't go if I were you. She has her lover—her fortune. What are we or our misfortunes to her? She has neither heart, nor gratitude, nor affection. She isn't worth a thought, and never was—there!"

"I wouldn't be too hard on her, Trix, if I were you," her brother answered coolly. "You would have taken Sir Victor yourself, you know, if you could have got him. I will go."

He went. The long, bright summer day passed; at six he was in Chester. There was some delay in procuring a conveyance to Powyss Place. Lamps glimmered in the windows of the old stone mansion as he alighted.

The servant started as he ushered him in, at his pale face and dusty garments.

"You will tell Miss Darrell I wish to see her at once, and alone," he said, slipping a shilling into the man's hand.

He took a seat in the familiar reception-room, and waited. Would she keep him long, he wondered—would she come to him—would she come at all? Yes, he knew she would, let him send for her, married or single, when and how he might, he knew she would come.

She entered as the thought crossed his mind, hastily, with a soft silken rustle, a waft of perfume. He rose up and looked at her; so for the space of five seconds they stood silent, face to face.

To the last hour of his life Charley Stuart remembered her, as he saw her then, and always with a sharp pang of the same pain.

She was dressed for a dinner party. She

PRETTY EASTER GIFTS

DAINTY LITTLE THINGS APPROPRIATE TO THE OCCASION.

How to Transform Eggshells into Ornaments—Vases and Bonbonnieres Made in Charming Designs—Caricatures That Will be Amusing to Young and Old.

Easter has become almost equally with Christmas in many families a day of gladness and gift-giving, while the custom should never be allowed to become a cause of expense ill to be borne, it is quite possible for everybody, high and low, to bring a little extra good feeling into the household by simple remembrances all around.

It is true that many a mother has nothing better to hand than a few eggs, but some of the most popular Easter gifts for children have been made from eggshells; likewise some of the daintiest for a fastidious friend; and a few hours have been enough time to make dozens of little offerings.

Countless are the conceits and none are elaborate. In the simpler forms the eggs are swiftly colored in rainbow hues with aniline dyes, thne daintily etched with a sharp-pointed knife; or they are coated with metallic paints; or they are frosted with diamond dust. For decorating by whatever method the eggs are either hard boiled or the contents are blown by means of a tiny hole at either end and then finished with narrow ribbons for hanging.

An exquisite greeting is this bit of nature's porcelain when transformed into a vase and filled with violets. The support for the vase is made of three pieces of bronzed wire, each three inches long, twisted together in the form of a tripod.

To make a vase, carefully break off the smaller end of the shell. Leave the edges jagged and gild them heavily. Decorate the outer shell with tiny sprigs of blue flowers in oil. A dainty bit of white and blue china is the result.

By tinting the shell a delicate yellow, gilding the jagged edges of the opening and then adding light designs in red and gold lines, the vase is suggestive of Royal Worcester.

A great variety of vases can be made. They should in every case be filled with dainty spring flowers.

Prior to the application of paints to the shell, it must be well washed, thoroughly dried, and rubbed with benzine. After this treatment there is no more difficulty in painting on eggshells than on paper.

THE BONBONNIERES.

Egg bonbonnieres, filled with choice confections, are welcome gifts to anyone, but they are specially suitable as presents to little friends.

Boil large eggs very hard. With a dies in pale and deep green, lined with sweet grass, is a delicious nest for colored eggs.

An artistic fancy is a straw basket twined and lined with smilax and filled with none but frosted eggs. The effect of glistening white from the soft, refreshing green is charming To the handle is tied a white satin ribbon on which is printed in gold an Easter greeting.

THE COMICAL EGGS.

But it is the egg caricatures that delight and amaze the little ones. The egg is blown and the shell cleaned and rubbed with benzine.

Fig. 1 shows the general style and features of two extremes—a sage and a dunce. Success depends upon the markings in sepia, which are few but striking. The eyes are either blue or brown. The lips and ears are red. The hair and beard are of fine cotton, glued in position. A cord tied to a splint, slipped through the hole through which the egg was blown, suspends these curious heads.

A nameless bird is seen in Fig. 2. The eggshell body is tinted brown. The neck and head are of pasteboard, glued to the body, and likewise tinted. Bright beads are glued on to serve as eyes. The feet are of bent wire. The claws must be of sufficient length to insure a firm support. A wonderful comb, tail and wings are of gorgeous feathers glued in place. The feathers are brightened with touches of gold and silver paint. The bird always proves a great success.

Fig. 3 shows a mischievous Dame Grundy. The head is an eggshell properly marked. The body is an English walnut, on which the head is made to rest by means of sealing wax or drippings from a wax candle. The arms and skirt are of stiff paper. The little gossiping dame is gowned and capped in tissue paper. She may be made to stand by spreading the stiff underskirt, or she may be suspended by a string running from the body through the head.

A right jolly little fellow can be modeled from Fig. 4. His body and head are eggshells. These are joined by slipping the splint with a string into the body shell and extending the cord up through the head. Features are painted in grotesque expression. The hair is of cotton, arms and limbs of pasteboard. The whole is painted a brilliant red, with trimmings in gold.

Pen-wipers for older children are made by decorating ordinary eggshells like heads. Effective models are those of a sweet-faced nun, a pretty student, with characteristic "mortar-board" hat, or a dear, smiling baby in lace-frilled cap. The shell head is securely glued to a support of several layers of chamois or flannel.

"Oh—you do !" said Trix, opening her eyes; "and how about yourself—don't you expect to enjoy yourself at all?"

"I would, no doubt, only—I am not going."

"Not going !" Thunderstruck, Trix repeats the words.

"No; it has been decided that I remain here. You won t miss me, Trix—you will have Captain Hammond."

"Captain Hammond may go hang himself. I want you, and you I mean to have. Let's sit down and reason this thing out. Now what new crotchet has got into your head? May I ask what your ladyship elect means to do?"

"To remain quietly here until—until—you know."

"Oh, I know !" with indescribable scorn; "until you are raised to the sublime dignity of a baronet's wife. And you mean to mope away your existence down here for the next two months. Why, you are fading away to a shadow. You shall come up to London with us and recuperate. Charley shall take you everywhere."

She saw her wince—yes, that was where the vital place lay. Miss Stuart ran on:

"The idea of living under the same roof for two mortal months with the young man you are going to marry! You're a great stickler for etiquette—I hope you don't call that etiquette? You started with us, and you shall stay with us—you belong to us, not to him, until the nuptial knot is tied. I wouldn't give a fig for London without you. I should die of the dismals in a week."

"What, Trix—with Captain Hammond?"

"Bother Captain Hammond! I want you. O Edie, do come?"

"I can't Trix." She turned away with an impatient sigh. "I have promised. Sir Victor wishes it, Lady Helena wishes it. It is impossible."

"And Edith Darrell wishes it. Oh, say it out, Edith," Trix retorted bitterly. "Your faults are many, but fear of the truth used not to be among them. You have promised. Is it that they are afraid to trust you out of their sight?"

"Let me alone, Trix. I am tired and sick—I can't bear it."

"I will let you alone, Miss Darrell. More—I will let you alone for the remainder of your life. All the past has been bad enough. Your deceit to me, your heartlessness to Charley—this is the last drop in the cup. You throw us over when we have served your turn for newer, grander friends—it is only the way of the world, and what one might expect from Miss Edith Darrell. But I didn't expect it—I didn't think ingratitude was one among your failings. I was a fool !" cried Trix, with a burst. "I always was a fool and always will be. But I'll be fooled by you no longer. Stay here, Miss Darrell, and when we say good-by day after to-morrow, it shall be good-by forever."

And then Miss Stuart, very red in the face, very flashing in the eyes, bounced out of the room, and Edith was left alone.

Only another friend lost forever. Well, she had Sir Victor Catheron left—he must suffice for all now.

All that day and most of the next she kept her room. It was no falsehood to say she was ill—she was. She lay upon her bed, her dark eyes open, her hands clasped over her head, looking blankly before her. To-morrow they must part, and after to-morrow—but her mind gave it up; she could not look beyond.

She came downstairs when to-morrow came to say farewell. The white wrapper she wore was not whiter than her face. Mr. Stuart shook hands in a nervous, hurried sort of way that had grown habitual to him of late. Mrs. Stuart kissed her fondly, Miss Stuart just touched her lips formally to her cheek, and Mr. Charles Stuart held her cold fingers for two seconds in his warm clasp, looked, with his own easy, pleasant smile, straight into her eyes, and said good-by precisely as he said it to Lady Helena. Then it was all over; they were gone; the wheels that bore them away crashed over the gravel. Edith Darrell felt as though they were crashing over her heart,

That night the Stuarts were established in elegant apartments at Langham's Hotel. "The splendid time" Trixy so confidently looked forward to never came. The very morning after their arrival came one of the boys in uniform with another sinister orange envelope for the head of the family. The head of the family chanced to be alone in his dressing-room. He took it with trembling hand and bloodshot eyes, and tore it open. A moment after there was a horrible cry like nothing human, then a heavy fall. Mrs. Stuart rushed in with a scream, and found her husband lying on the floor, the message in his hand, in a fit.

* * * * * *

Captain Hammond had made an appoint-ders rose up exquisitely out of the point lace trimmings, her arms sparkled in the lights.

In very few words he told her—the great tragedies of life are always easily told. They were ruined—he had engaged their passage by the next steamer—he had merely run down as they were never likely to meet again—for the sake of old times, to say good-by.

Old times! Something rose in the girl's throat, and seemed to choke her. Oh, of all the base, heartless, mercenary, ungrateful wretches on earth, was there another so heartless, so ungrateful as she? Poor—Charley poor! For one moment—one—the impulse came upon her to give up all—to go with him to beggary if need be. Only for one moment—I will do Miss Darrell's excellent worldly wisdom this justice—only one.

"I see you are dressed for a party—I will not detain you a second longer. I could not depart comfortably, considering that you came over in our care, without informing you why we leave so abruptly. You are safe. Your destiny is happily settled. I can give to your father a good account of my stewardship. You have my sincerest wishes for your health and happiness, and I am sure you will never quite forget us. Good-by, Miss Darrell." He held out his hand. "My congratulations are premature, but let me offer them now to the future Lady Catheron."

"Miss Darrell!" When, in all the years that were gone, had he ever called her that before? She arose and gave him her hand—proud, pale.

"I thank you," she said coldly. "I will send Lady Helena and Sir Victor to you at once. They will wish to see you, of course. Good-by, Mr. Stuart. Let us hope things may turn out better than you think. Give my dearest love to Trix, if she will accept it. Once more, good-by."

She swept to the door in her brilliant dress, her perfumed laces, her shining jewels—the glittering tripperies for which her womanhood was to be sold. He stood quite still in the centre of the room, as she had left him, watching her. So beautiful, so cold-blooded, as he was thinking; were all her kind like this? And poets sing and novelists rave of woman's love! A half smile came over his lips as he thought of it, It was very pretty to read of in books; in real life it was—like this!

She laid her hand on the silver handle of the door—then she paused—looked back, all the womanliness, all the passion of her life stirred to its depths. It was good-bye forever to Charley. There was a great sob, and pride bowed and fell over. She rushed back—two impetuous arms went around his neck; she drew his face down, and kissed him passionately—once—twice,

"Good-by, Charley—my darling—forever and ever !"

She threw him from her almost violently, and rushed out of the room. Whether she went to tell Lady Helena and Sir Victor of his presence he neither knew nor cared. He was in little mood to meet either of them just then.

Five minutes later, and under the blue silvery summer night, he was whirling away back to Chester. When the midnight stars shone in the sky he was half way up to London, with Edith's farewell words in his ears, Edith's first, last kiss on his lips.

SERVANTS' CATECHISM.

The Extraordinary Interrogatories Put to a Former Employer.

Perhaps some of my lady readers will sympathize with a complaint I have had as to the number and length of the interrogations occasionally administer by ladies when nquiring as to the character of servants. Here is a sample:

Do you consider her thoroughly respectable, honest, good-natured and obliging?

Is she clean in her work and her person?

Does she dress neatly?

Does she thoroughly understand plain cooking and housework?

Is she of good height, manners and general appearance?

Kindly mention how long she was in your service, when and why she left, what character you had with her, and what wages you paid her?

Do you know what she has been doing since she left your service?

Is she quick, sensible, able to learn and an early riser?

Has she any serious faults, and will you kindly say if you consider her in any way unsuitable for a good situation?

Are you acquainted with her father

Napanee Paint Works.

For some years past Messrs. Madden & Co. have been manufacturing Japans and Dipping Paints which have been shipped to all parts of the Dominion, and for two years past they have been making regular shipments to Great Britian. The success met with in manufacturing these lines, and believing that there is room for a strictly honest ready-mixed paint, they purchased last fall the last and most improved Paint Mills and Mixers. This machinery was placed in their factory, (formerly the premises of the Napanee Cement Co.), and have been running steady all winter. They now have ready all the latest shades in house paints, put up in all sized cans. In the preparation of their paints they use only the best lead, fine minerals, coloring material, etc, ground in and thinned with linseed oil. Their paints are for inside or outside work. Their floor paint is guaranteed to harden in ten hours. We are fortunate in having a first class reliable paint manufacturer at our doors and Madden's pure, ready-mixed paints will be in demand.

Relief in Six Hours.—Distressing Kidney and Bladder disease relieved in six hours by the "NEW GREAT SOUTH AMERICAN KIDNEY CURE." This new remedy is a great surprise and delight to physicians on account of its exceeding promptness in relieving pain in the bladder, kidneys, back and every part of the urinary passages in male or female. It relieves retention of water and pain in passing it almost immediately. If you want quick relief and cure this is your remedy. Sold by W. S. Detlor. 46

S. S. Association.

The annual meeting of the S. S. Association for Napanee and North Fredericksburgh held in the lecture room of the Presbyterian church on Thursday evening, March 28th, was well attended, and the interest manifested was gratifying and encouraging. After devotional exercises, and a brief address by the president, Dr. Bissonnette, the officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows: President, Dr. Bissonnette; Vice Pres., Mr. A. C. Parks; Sec, J. Bowerman; Treas., Mrs. Dr. Edwards; Auditors, A. Alexander and A. E. Paul; Executive Committee, pastor and superintendent of the schools forming the Association, together with the officers of the association. The next meeting will be held in Anderson's church, North Fredericksburgh. The preview of the lesson for next quarter by Mrs. Symington was an admirable presentation, and elicited a desire that others should have an opportunity to profit by it. The association requested that the paper should be printed in pamphlet form for distribution. G. M. Elliott presented an outline blackboard sketch of a plan of "The Holy City" showing the location of important places mentioned in connection with the closing scenes of our Lord's life. In dealing with the subject Mr. Elliott showed clearly that a blackboard sketch (such as can be made by anyone) growing in presence of the class is superior for purposes of instruction, to an elaborate map which because of its multiplicity of details tends to distract the attention of the learner from the point which the teacher desires to impress. The subject "How to increase attendance of parents at the Sunday School" was introduced by O. Hinch, who suggested the appointment of visitors with specified districts allotted, who should visit the parents in their homes and urge the claims of the Sunday School and the importance of their Co operation. A. L Morden thought the problem would be solved if parents could be made to see that their children needed as much care and attention as their thoroughbred stock. That with a proper view of the spiritual needs of their chilren they would see to it. Not only that the children attended Sunday School regularly, but that they received proper teaching while there. S. Gibson mentioned the influence of Home Classes in arousing interest in the minds of the parents. The president closed the discussion by relating an ancedote of a superintendent who accounted for the large attendance by saying "We gather them in."

Mr. S. S. McDonald, the specialist in electro treatments, is stopping at Mrs. Scott's opposite the Court House in Napanee. He says he is prepared to treat successfully with mild currents of electro magnetism in their own homes people suffering from any of the following named diseases, colds, grip, acute catarrh, acute bronchitis, despondency, dyspepsia, nerve debility, headache, toothache, neuralgia, sciatica, lumbago, sprains, wounds, bruises and rheumatism. He says he cured Arthur L. Smith, of Bold street, Hamilton, of the grip in two days, and he took no relapse, although he went to work next day, and it was cold and blustry; and that with two scientific treatments he cured a badly sprained back, and with the same number soothed a palpitating heart. His treatments are given according to the rules specified by a medical doctor who practised extensively according to allopathic rules and graduated in the School of Homoeopathics, and cured thousands of people with the electricity where all his other remedies failed. Mr. McDonald can furnish good references from other place that he has visited. 18b-p

The Robinson Co's Millinery Opening.

There is no occupation so delightful to the ladies as that of shopping, and just at this season of the year when the various firms in town are holding their spring millinery openings and more than ever vieing with one another in their display of goods, the occupation is doubly delightful to them. The Robinson Co. held their annual spring millinery opening on Saturday last and will continue it through the week. Crowds of delighted ladies from town and the surrounding country have attended it, and if the many flattering remarks passed upon the firm's display goes for anything, the large number of pretty hats and bonnets, so temptingly displayed, will adorn the faces of many of the pleased matrons and maidens that congregated to view them. An EXPRESS representative paid a visit to the Robinson Co's. store this week, and had a look through the millinery department. On entering this store one cannot but be struck with the large stock carried by this firm. They command two large stores, which are well stocked with all lines appertaining to dry goods, the gents furnishing business, dress making, etc. Their display of millinery is indeed an entrancing vision. Their shapes are all manufactured by the firm's milliner, Miss Lee, who is a past mistess in the art, A long experience, coupled with natural good taste, has given her that finer discrimination in shaping, selecting flowers and trimming, so as to produce the happy effect of blending the various tints and colors harmoniously. The leading styles displayed are free from loudness and vulgarity, and appeal to the refined and artistic taste at once. The thought struck us that The Robinson Co's. hats were all saleable articles, and that of itself is a good recommendation, as it is the primary motive for the display. As to the most fashionable styles this year we went fully into that in our last issue, and it is therefore unnecessary to repeat it this week. Among the many pretty designs, which embraced a number of entirely original and novel ones, that we have space to notice, was a toque, Napoleon, made of solid jet, without a brim, and trimmed with three rosettes, one in the centre of the front with a heliotrope osprey, and one at each end of the broad effect, and two flowers in two different shades, yellow and heliotrope, in the back of ribbon. Another pretty Napoleon had a fancy braid crown, with shirred lace brim trimmed with black tips and Napoleon blue ribbon and brown roses. A very pretty hat was an Empire, entirely square in shape, covered with apple green silk ribbon and a sherrin of black lace, with a cirrus of variegated velvet roses large loops of ribbon of a yard in width, forming the top brim; foliage and roses, and the under brim trimmed with fine gilt and green, make a pretty effect. A Napoleon bonnet, made of straw braid sewn together with a rolled brim, took our fancy. It was trimmed with black flowers and black cirrus satin ribbon, with yellow ospreys, interwoven with the ribbon and beads of jet. A Dutch bonnet with a crown was very pretty. The shape is of solid jet, with rosettes of flowers at each corner of the front, green and heliotrope in color; there is two large fans of solid jet at each corner of the back, which is trimmed in fans of lace and ribbons. There are many other leading shapes, including misses hats, etc., we would like to mention but lack of space forbids. A visit to The Robinson Co's. store will repay you and will speak louder an more effectively than all the descriptions we might write.

GENERAL NEWS.

The Ottawa Malcontents and the Archbishop of Ontario.

On Monday, March 25th, 1895, being the 33rd anniversary of the Archbishop's consecration, the following address was presented to His Grace after Divine Service in the Cathedral, Kingston, Ont.:—

TO THE MOST REVEREND JOHN TRAVERS LEWIS, D.D., D.C.L., LORD ARCHBISHOP OF ONTARIO AND METROPOLITAN OF CANADA.

May it please Your Grace:

To-day as you commemorate the thirty-third anniversary of your consecration as Bishop of Ontario, your Clergy desire to congratulate you most heartily upon having been spared to discharge, for so exceptionally long a period, the duties of your sacred office. Of those who were Bishops of the Anglican Communion within the limits of the British Empire at the time of your consecration, only one is now engaged in active work.

Your Grace has seen the number of your clergy grow from 55 to 135; of parishes, from 48 to 113; of congregations, from 91 to 281. Over 35,000 persons have received at your hands the Apostolic Rite of Confirmation. Besides the spiritual growth which these figures indicate, the material progress of the Church in this Diocese under Your Grace's administration has been equally marked, the number of churches having increased from 70 to 230, and of parsonage houses from 19 to 84; while the contributions to Diocesan Funds have steadily advanced from year to year throughout this whole period.

But more gratifying than even this progress has been the happy disappearance of party feeling in your Diocese and the growing unity of spirit among clergy and laity as exemplified in Synodical and Parochial work. For many years past all have worked harmoniously together, sacrificing no principle but recognizing the duty and the benefit of united action.

It is a matter for deep regret that efforts have recently been made to destroy this unity; and we desire to express as strongly as possible our disapproval and condemnation of the means employed to accomplish this end, namely, the misrepresentation of your action in declining to be dictated to as to the terms upon which you would accept candidates for holy orders; your offence being that you yourself prescribe the conditions of acceptance instead of allowing the applicant to do so. Your Grace's practice is merely what every Bishop does, and must do if a Bishop is to have any responsibility whatever regarding candidates for ordination. They must be accepted upon some conditions, and these conditions surely are to be decided by the bishop and not by the candidate or his friends.

So far as our relation with Your Grace are concerned, there is no need to assure you that misrepresentations of your action are being circulated throughout the Diocese, we feel that we, who know you best, ought to declare ourselves.

With every good wish and prayer for your well-being, and that of the Church under your care,

We remain your faithful Clergy.

(Signed by all the Clergy of the Diocese.)

THE ARCHBISHOP'S REPLY.

REVEREND AND DEAR BRETHREN:—It is with gratitude to Almighty God that I desire to acknowledge His great mercies to me on this day when I enter on the thirty-fourth year of my Episcopate, and also to express my thanks to you individually—my heart-felt appreciation of the kindness that has prompted your congratulatory address.

I join with you in thankfulness for the progress the Diocese has made in things spiritual and temporal, as indicated by the statistics you bring forward, and I pray that such progress may be maintained in the future, as it will assuredly be if the unity and co-operation which have hitherto made the Diocese conspicuous be not interrupted by the reckless agitation lately sprung up in Ottawa. It is a misfortune that you should feel constrained to take notice of it, but I do not see how it could have been avoided when your Bishop was so falsely and I fear maliciously slandered.

For the last two months, owing to illness and partial loss of sight, I have been unable to read or write, and therefore I was for a time ignorant of the meeting held in St. George's school house, Ottawa. At first I thought that it might have resembled that of Demetrius at Ephesus, of which St. Luke gives us this description: "Some, therefore, cried one thing and some another: for the assembly was confused; and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together." But I know now that the Ottawa meeting was worse than that of Ephesus. It was a wicked attempt to impose on the dupes there assembled. The prominent charge against me was that I had said that "I never would ordain a Wycliffe student." This was a base fabrication. I never said a word or wrote a line to that effect. I am not given to making sweeping assertions or declarations of policy which I know may have to be modified or changed under changed circumstances of the future. If the rioters at the meeting had charged me with the following misdemeanor they would have been strictly accurate, viz., that I withstood the insolent demand of a priest in Ottawa that I should admit to examination for Holy Orders three years hence a candidate of his selection on his conditions and not on mine. His followers, no doubt, are ignorant that it is the perogative of all Bishops to ordain on their own conditions, not on those of irresponsible friends of candidates for Holy Orders,—a perogative I am not likely to resign at the bidding of a meeting which has shocked every right-minded Christian.

It may be well to make plain to you my attitude towards Wycliffe College. Up to the present time I have never made any public statement on the subject, nor exhibited the least hostility to the college, though I never viewed its establishment with favour. Ever since I could reason on such subjects I disliked the multiplication of small Theological Seminaries. I believe that they beget narrowness which ends in bigotry. This is inevitable when young men of a certain theological stripe are hived together to be moulded to order by professors as narrow as themselves. The policy of the first Bishops of Canada, like Bishop Mountain and Strachan, was to consolidate the strength of the Church on the establishment of one or two great Universities where Theological students should be educated in the same buildings with students in Arts, as in the great Universities in England and Iraland. This course of action, if adopted, would ensure less bigotry, abler professors, larger libraries and more spacious buildings. Wycliffe College, being an additional Theological Seminary, and in my opinion quite unnecessary, was therefore regarded by me with disfavour, especially by reason of the object sought to be attained by its erection, which was avowedly the overthrow of Trinity University, and by the use of means which I shall not mention as I wish to avoid controversy.

I have been identified with Trinity College from the day of its foundation. I know its full history, I have fought its battles, and by virtue of seniority of consecration am now the Chairman of its Corporation. Is it not then too much to ask of even archiepiscopal good nature that I should view with equal esteem and favour a College intended to spring into popularity out of the ruins of Trinity College?

But this is not the only ground for my dear friend the late Bishop of Lincoln in my hearing as a gross perversion of the object sought to be attained by the founder of those lectures, the Rev. John Bampton. I also object to it as an authorized "book of reference" for candidates for Holy Orders.

But further, I disagree with a great deal of the theological teaching given in Wycliffe College. I give as an illustration the following passage taken from the Calendar of the College. Among the "Distinctive Principles" of this College is "An Historical Episcopate traceable to Apostolic direction, as conductive to THE WELL BEING but not necessary to THE BEING of the Church." This I believe to be a fiction without a particle of support from the New Testament, primitive antiquity, or the Book of Common Prayer. It is a device manufactured by well-meaning but puzzle-headed people in order to escape from the dilemma of unchurched sects. But the device is insulting. It seems to say to those that are not members of the Church: "You have an existence, it is true, but not a good one. You are in what is called the ESSE of a Church, but not the BENE ESSE,"—just as if the Apostles had transmitted to us a choice of Churches of various grades of orthodoxy—as if the Catholic Church was like a railway train made up of first and second-class carriages—and as if any sensible Christian would not prefer to be a member of a body that had a good constitution, to remaining a member of one that had merely a claim to existence! Now I do not believe a word of this figment, and I prefer that those ordained by me should disbelieve it also.

It is very painful to me to be forced to enter upon this subject at all. My intention has always been to let Wycliffe College alone to work out its own future. I have felt and still feel that it may be destined to do good. Candidates for Holy orders, trained there, or some of them, will no doubt revise opinions gained there when they have had more experience and a wider range of reading, instances of which are not wanting. For this and other reasons it was my desire to say nothing to its disparagement; but the provocation has been too great to permit me to be silent. The insults offered to myself would not have elicited a remark from me, but I must notice those offered to our brethren in Ottawa. When men of high standing and long service in the Church like Archdeacon Lauder and Rural Deans Bogert and Pollard, are hissed down because they manfully endeavored to say a word in defence of their absent bishop, a righteous anger must be felt. I tender to them my sympathy and promise them my firm support. They may have to withstand further opposition from the organization that has been framed to perpetuate discord; but they may rest assured that the good sense of the Church of England will never allow a club of self-constituted theologians, either in Ottawa or elsewhere, to regulate the affairs of the Church by usurping the functions of our General and Provincial Synods, and substituting for the canons and immemorial usages of the church the resolutions of intimidation meetings where freedom of speech is not permitted and Evangelical religion is caricatured.

Meanwhile let us continue in the old paths and work on in faith; and, as that really Evangelical prelate, the Bishop of Winchester, said when threatened with an action at law by a candidate whom he rejected for his ignorance, "I sleep in peace."

Believe me ever yours affectionately in the bonds of the Church,

J. T. ONTARIO.

A Lady Saved

Life Was a Burden and all Remedies Failed till B. B. B. was Tried, now Digestion is Perfect, and Health Has Returned.

DEAR SIRS,—Until lately I suffered continually from Headache caused by Constipation, which rendered my life a burden to myself and to others. After trying doctors and remedies without number and with no good results, I was advised to try B. B. B. I now rejoice that I did so, for two bottles have completely cured me. I now eat well, and my digestion is perfect. I believe there is no remedy equal to B. B. B., and I recommend it to all sufferers.

"Senex," in the Owen Sound Advertiser, under the heading "When I was a boy," has the following to say of Napanee:—"The place called Napanee was, when I was a boy, known as Cartwright's Mills, and there was nothing there then but the mills. The Indians used to go there to get flour and brought baskets to give in exchange. When asked what they wanted for the baskets they would say na-pa-ne (flour). Hence the place got to be called Napanee.

TARANTULAS, SCORPIONS AND SUCH

Reassuring Facts Vouched for by Eminent Bug Sharps.

The Bureau of Entomology has been collecting some interesting information lately about scorpions, centipedes and tarantulas. Respecting these creatures all sorts of nosensical beliefs are prevalent, and travellers who have visited tropical regions disagree as to the effects of their bites. That the poison of any one of the three is apt to be deadly has often been asserted. The question derives particular importance from the fact that the animals are constantly imported into this country in bunches of bananas and among other fruits from lower latitudes.

Tarantulas are simply big spiders of the kind that build houses with trap door. Their bite is very severe and painful, the scar lasting for a long time, but, though it produces a violent inflammation for a short time, it is not dangerous to life. Such, at all events, is the belief of Prof. C. V. Riley. In regard to the centipedes, Prof. Riley says that its bite in warm climates is sometimes excessively virulent and painful, though at other times, oddly enough, the poison causes little inconvenience. That it is ever fatal is not believed.

Scorpion stings are very painful indeed. They are dangerous in proportion to the size of th[illegible] its age, and the state o[illegible] it may be. To[illegible] fluence [illegible] that th[illegible] proof.

It is a common belief that the legs of the centipede are poisonous, and that they will leave a trial that burns like fire if the animal runs over the bare flesh. This is wholly a mistake. The creature is naturally timid, and will not even try to bite if it can get away.
The poison causes a good deal of pain, pocketbook with over $200 in it held in his mouth. Shot—which is his name —seems to be as familiar with the worth of articles he may happen to come across in his skirmishes around town as any human being, and it is the result of early training. His owner, when the dog was a puppy, patiently taught him to retrieve various articles, and frequently used bills and coin in this practice. In this way, probably, the animal learned to distinguish the peculiar scent of money, for it has an aroma that is acquired from being carried on the person. But no matter what the secret is, Shot is a lucky dog in every sense of the word, for he never comes across money that he does not eagerly pick it up and race home with it. And he'll bring lots of other things that evidently appear to him as useful.

If there is an old cast-off hat in his course he'll carry it to Harrison, and old rags or clothing are as dutifully taken the same way. He's an excellent field dog also, but has never been known to retrieve a bird. So Shot is a sort of canine paradox in his run-and-fetch qualities."—Washington Star.

How Far Thunder Can be Heard.

It is believed that lightning is visible at a distance of 150 miles, but it is still in controversy how far away thunder can be heard. A French astronomer has made observations on the subject, and he declares it impossible for thunder to be heard at a greater distance than t n miles. An English meteorologist has counted up to 130 seconds between the flash and the thunder, which would give a distance of 27 miles.

Judge Clark, of the Los Angeles, Cal., Superior Court, has established a precedent that it is hoped that all courts will follow. It appears that a parson of that city had a pique against a lady who is public librarian, and made her the subject of public prayer in his church. She sued him for libel, but he pleaded that his utterances to the Lord were privileged. Judge Clark promptly overruled the plea and declared that a libel in a public prayer differs in no wise from any other libelous utterance.

The funeral service of the Rev. Thomas Cleworth took place Thursday afternoon, in the Eastern Methodist church. The Bearers were ministers of the Bay of Quinte Conference, Reverend Stratton, chairman of the Napanee District, Rev. Dr. McDermaid, of Napanee, Rev. Baker of Belleville, Rev. H. I. Allen, Napanee. Rev. Crossley, of Napanee, Rev. Rice, chairman of Tamworth District, and Rev. J. C. Wilson, chairman of Madoc District, took part in the services. The choir rendered very choice music, Miss Hall presiding as organist.

A Shabby Fraud.

The meanest of impositions is the foisting upon a sick man a worthless substitute for the medicine that will restore him to health. The public is warned against worthless pills, sold in loose form, by the dozen, hundred or ounce, and against imitations purporting to be "the same except in name" as Dr. Williams Pills. The old fashioned Bland's Iron Pill, (colored pink) is falsely commended by some dealers as a substitute for Dr. Williams Pink Pill. Please bear in mind that Dr. Williams Pink Pills are not like any other medicine and no dealer can prepare them. They are sold only in wooden boxes, about two inches long, with circular of directions and wrapper printed in red ink bearing the full name "Dr. Williams Pink Pills for Pale People" Pills offered in any other manner are a fraudulent imitation and should always be refused. Remember that Dr. Williams Pink Pills make pure, rich, red blood, and cure when other medicines fail.

Big Bells of Europe.

Among the big bells of Europe are the famous Suzanne of Erfurt, 10½ ft. high and 8¼ ft. in diameter, cast in 1497, which weighs about 30,000 lb; one at Olmutz, cast in 1711, which weighs 40,000 lb; another at Vienna, some 450 lb. less, and that in the Cathedral of Paris, 38,000 lbs. The biggest bell in England is said to be "Great Paul," cast for St. Paul's Cathedral. About 20 tons of metal were used to cast the bell, which weighs about 39,200 lbs.

Spring is here. That is just what will suit us all.

The people of this place are very busily engaged in their spring work.

I am a Farmer's son, although I have no love for the farm now. You see circumstances often alter cases, and the N. P. has altered the prices of farm produce to such an extent that I'm a quitter. I remember when I was a boy, a man on this street used to sing "The boy behind the plow, now he sings (remember this is all under the N. P.) "I'll have a sale of plows."

On Thursday last Mrs. Benjamin Young, of Gretna, and Mrs. Byard Young, of Napanee, were the guest of Mrs. M. G. Post.

CENTREVILLE WEST.

The long, stormy winter has passed away and spring has once more made its appearance.

Spring work may be said to have fairly commenced.

It is an old story that nothing "succeeds like success," but permanent success means merit, in an age of enlightment. The success achieved by Mr. T. Vandewater, of Centreville, agent for the Noxon Bros., of Ingersol, in selling their famous machinery in this vicinity has surpassed all previous efforts ever made by him. He has opened a grand show room on Centre street, thereby enabling everyone who visits the village to see and inspect for himself.

The letter of Mr. D. J. Waggoner in last Friday's "News" announcing his resignation from the Patron society was met with approval here by all truly loyal patrons. Since they heard his speech at the Patron's picnic, last August held at Beaver Lake they have had little belief in his sincerity to the party. He is something similar to the Croydon "member" who fearing he would be unable to receive the patron nomination for municipal honors returned to his old party in order to receive their nomination, but unfortunately for him when the ballots were counted he found he was elected to stay at "home." While Waggoner was immigration agent under the Dominion Government he was a good conservative. Losing this office he became a Patron denouncing in strong terms the wilful extravagance of that Government. If he had received the Patron nomination instead of Mr. Rodgers he would still be a patron, perhaps he sees some other opening now. The conservatives are at a want to find a man to oppose Mr. Rodgers. If he should receive it there will be another cause for hilarity among the Patrons back here, as it will ensure the election of Mr. Rodgers for Frontenac. The Patrons here have the greatest confidence in their leader and heartily endorse the stand taken by him in the Legislature. Mr. Haycock has proven himself a leader who is able to lead.

the paid spouter, the tap through which the wind of the Ottawa Ministry has been squirted, and if any of his enthusiastic friends ever pause to examine the situation they will notice that all his oratorical periods are paid for by someone who puts up his money in order to gain an advantage that the people of Canada, intelligently considering the question, would not grant. It is neither politic nor prudent, perhaps, to reflect upon this class of politician. He is omnipresent because he has a pass or his railway fare is paid; his powers of convincing the public are not hindered by thoughts of a neglected business or an ungrasped opportunity, yet he is the most dangerous quantity that could be injected into the already tainted blood of Canadian politics. If men of this sort are to be our rulers we have a right to ask ourselves, how must we expect to be ruled? Is mouth to be chosen in preference to principle? Are audacity and indomitable cheek to be preferred to political virtue? Is facility in changing one's attitude to be applauded as we would laugh at and approve of the antics of the clown in a circus? It has been Dr. Montague's good fortune to escape by his sauve manner and exceeding good-fellowship the criticism of people who neither believe in him as a statesman nor approve of him as anything but a county heeler. It is quite possible that he may reach the highest niche in Canadian politics, for he has certainly proved himself able and willing to adopt any device necessary to hoodwink, mislead or betray those who prize the capacity of the mouth rather than the loyalty and goodness of the heart. That a man can be elected who is such a political hanger-on while the issue was one of supreme importance to Canada, marks an epoch in our history which thoughtful men should pause to consider.

AN ORCHID ENTHUSIAST.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain Has Now Nearly Six Thousand Varieties.

There can be no doubt that Mr. Joseph Chamberlaind's fidelity to the orchid has done more towards strengthening the cult of the flower than the action of anyone else.

His attention was first directed to the orchid in an accidental manner about 20 years ago, and since that time he has been adding continually to his collection at "Highbury," near Birmingham, until at the present moment he has between 5,000 and 6,000 plants of all kinds, which have been drawn from all parts of the orchid-producing world.

Altogether, they fill 13 glass houses, arranged along the side of Mr. Chamberlain's house, and he takes every means of enjoying his beautiful orchids when at home. Every since his appearance as a statesman the flower in his buttonhole, for which he is noted, has been the subject of many a remark in the House.

Before the great Home Rule split the [illegible] was an illustration of Mr [illegible] character, his SHIPS AND THE OCEAN.

IS THERE AS MUCH DISASTER ON THE SEA AS EVER?

Ratio of Tonnage to Cargo—Though Commerce Has Increased Enormously the Number of Ships is Not so Greatly Increased as is Their Size—The Age of Ships—Eccentricity of Ships' Names.

To the average landsman the disaster to the Elbe steamship justifies the popular belief in the infinite dangers of the sea, while a sailor can scarcely realize that in a roadway fifty miles wide two vessels can meet in collision, and in fact it illustrates the wildest possibility of chance thats uch a thing should be. But there are no condition of safety to life that the selfish greed of man may not vitiate. A short voyage and quick dispatch means money in the ship owner's pocket, and his ship must take the shortest road and drive ahead to make this result. How well defined are the ocean paths may be seen from the race of three English clipper ships from San Francisco in 1890. They were bound for Liverpool with cargoes of grain, all went around the Horn, and when the Speedwell took her pilot at the mouth of the Mersey the royals of the Lord Goring were seen ten miles away, and by the time the victor reached her dock the third vessel was signalled. These ships had sailed 10,000 miles, tacked frequently, met head winds, and yet, taking one common road across the stormy main, came into port within six hours of each other.

Old sailors still contend that there is as much disaster on the ocean as ever. Despite the enormous increase of commerce, it is not unlikely that there were more ships traversing the ocean in 1830 than now, but they were seldom over 800 tons, and one of our tramp steamers will carry more cargo than five of the old square riggers. In 1830 there were not less than 400 ships making ocean voyages from this port, and owned here. John Thompson & Co. owned and chartered 30; now there is not a single square-rigged ship belonging to Philadelphia.

As there was no tug boats in those days there would be sometimes 30 ships lying at the capes waiting for a wind, and when a southeaster set in all set sail and backed and filled their way up, getting in safely. Even now, although we have tugs, and the Delaware is buoyed and lighted more than any river in the Union, scarce a day passes without ships colliding, grounding or going ashore. But the Delaware was a much bigger river then than now.

Those old ship builders must have wrought with a conscience, for some of their work seems invulnerable to the assaults of time. In 1817 a Dutch brig came here with a cargo of gin for the Bohlens. That barque had been on the stocks the very day that William of Orange sailed for England to drive King James from the throne, 1688, and the old tub looked good for another century. In 1830 another Dutch barque was in port, the "Stadtholder," and it is in the recollection of the writer in 1841 that in this craft John Cadwalader came to America, in 1701.

Considering the hazardous nature of their employment, whalers attain a very marked length of service. The Samuel W. Enderby, of Hull, England, is still in service. She was built in 1759. The old East Indiamen or "Tea Waggons" were practically invulnerable to the assault of time. They were nearly all built at Bombay, of teak timber and by Pharsee ship carpenters, and their joinery and fitting was like fine cabinet work. In 1770 the Scarborough, East Indiaman, was wrecked on the Laccadive Islands, on the west coast of India, and with her went £400,000 of Warren Hastings' spoils. In 1859 the writer [illegible] this wreck. Her

MATE IN THREE MOVES.

Two ladies were sitting together over the fire in the twilight of a winter afternoon. The younger of the two, with her face resting on her hands, leaned forward and stared moodily at the glowing coals. The other was reposing in the luxurious depths of an arm chair, with that ill-disguised expression of elation on her hard features, which the best of us assume on learning of our neighbors' misfortunes.

"You will do me the justice, Camilla," she remarked, in hard and metallic tones, "to remember that I foretold this."

"Very likely you did," said the other, plaintively. "You have prophesied every kind of disaster for me at one time or another. That's your nature, and you can't help it, I suppose. But Fred seemed so good and so true, and we have only been married six months, and——"

Her voice faltered, and the firelight showed that there were tears in her eyes.

"Whn I first heard of your mad engagement," continued Miss Singleton, rising from her chair, and thereby revealing the fact that she wore a divided skirt, "I did my very best to save you. I sent you the most striking pamphlets of the Man's Suppression League, and a copy of my own lecture, entitled 'Matrimony or Slavery?' proving conclusively, as you will remember, that 79 per cent. of the marriages made each year turn out unhappily; so that, if you read these papers, you rushed into misfortune with your eyes open. And now, when you have been married for about half a year, you tell me that you are nearly sure that your husband is illusing you. This much, you admit, though you refuse to give me the particulars, and it is not much use your asking me to help you unless I know everything. Tell me," with a gleam of inspiration, "does he throw plates at you?"

A smile flickered over Camilla Dickson's sad face at this sugestion. "Thanks for your kind inquiry, but the crockery is still whole, I believe."

"Ah," responded Miss Singleton, slightly disappointed. "Then he doesn't belong to class 2, sub-section B. We have all kinds of faults, you know, classified in the 'Hand-book of Bad Husbands.' If he only threw plates—but never mind. Does he dine at the club every day?"

"Really, Miss Singleton," remarked Camilla, becoming justly irritated, "you have no right whatever to ask these questions, which are not only rude, but wholly wide of the mark. Fred is—outwardly at least—just as affectionate as ever; that's the bitterest part of it. It was foolish for me to say anything at all about my troubles to you. Let's talk about something else, please."

"Camilla Dickson," said the other, solemnly, standing over the girl, and eyeing her sternly through her pincenex, "you know very well that I am not going to be put off like that. Not so much for your own sake as for the sake of the cause—for the sake of Our Emancipation from Male Tyranny"—Miss Singleton spoke in large capitals—"I feel bound to learn in what way your husband has ill-treated you. Is it cruelty? Is it neglect? Is it a clandestine correspondence with——"

"Yes," flashed out Camilla, "if you must know, it is. And I do think you might try to be a little more sympathetic and feeling, when I am so miserable, and her words ended with something very like a sob.

"Ho!" said Miss Singleton, quite unmoved, "a clandestine corespondence, is it? And do you know who the other is? And how did you find it out?"

"Why, Fred has lately seemed so anxious and absent-minded at breakfast, and directly it is over he shuts himself up in his study for hours. Also, I could not help noticing that he got a lette[illegible]ten a post card, in a v[illegible]is[illegible] know, almost [illegible]eas stared [illegible]bout ten [illegible] and

He keeps a large book, and into this each one is entered under its number, with a description of the plant, its purchase place of origin, and divers details of interest. His gardeners say that they believe Mr. Chamberlain knows every plant which he possesses.

Sales of orchids are now so frequent that in ten years' time there is no knowing what the dimensions of the collection may be, for if Mr. Chamberlain does not personally attend he is represented, and so keen is he on augmenting his stock that the bidding sometimes goes up to absurdly high prices.

When residing in London Mr. Chamberlain has two flowers adapted for buttonhole wear sent to him from Birmingham every day, and these are the blooms with which he makes his appearance in the House of Commons.—Pearson's Weekly.

CONSUMPTION OF ALCOHOL.

Statistics as to the Ratio in Which It is Taken in Great Britain.

In 1895 the consumption of beer in England was 32 gallons per head; in Scotland 16, and in Ireland 16; the consumption of cider in England 0.4 and none at all in the other two countries; the consumption of spirits in England 0.8, in Scotland 1.9, in Ireland 1; the consumption of wine 0.5 in England, 0.5 in Scotland, and 0.2 in Ireland. The English drinker's partiality for beer and the Scotch and the Irish drinker's preference for spirits is clearly shown.

When the amounts are converted into their equivalents of alcohol, we see that Ireland consumes least—1.4 gallons per head, Scotland comes next with 1.6, and England heads the list with 2.13 gallons of alcohol for each man, woman and child of the population; this, by curious and undesigned coincidence, is just under one ounce per day a head, the quantity which so many medical authorities assume can be safely taken—the physiological quantity which the country has heard so much of in late years.

Children seldom touch alcohol, most women take little, and many men do not take any at all; so that the habitual consumers of alcohol, whether they drink to excess or not, get through three or four times the amount which the leading medical authorities assert should not be exceeded.—All the Year Round.

The Movement of Jokes.

The curious way in which newspaper jokes move around in cycles, disappearing for a time and then reappearing as original, has more than once been commented upon. Once in a while a similar tendency is noted in the short stories of the day. For instance: In May, 1893, the St. James' Gazette of London printed such a story under the title "A Fair Confederate." The Evening Post copied this story, crediting it to the St. James' Gazette, a few weeks later. Then it slumbered awhile, was brought out with other stories in book form, and last month appeared, somewhat abridged and under a new title, in the San Francisco Argonut. The New York Tribune of January 20 copied it, crediting it to the Argonaut, and yesterday it appeared in the New York Sun. To make the cycle complete it should now reappear in the St. James' Gazette.—New York Post.

...nd. ...ong the ... ...ries was a magnificent collar of rubies, valued at £80,000, and £20,000 was the reward offered for its recovery. In 1801 the British took several of the Maldive Islands, about 300 miles south of the Laccadives, as convict stations. The surgeon, a Scotchman, in exploring the island, stopped at a native's hut near the shore. A woman who was moving about had something that glittered woven in her black hair. The doctor saw that it was a jewel in a European setting and spoke to the man, who was frightened, and sold the jewels to the surgeon for a small sum. They were the lost rubies. When search was made for the former possessors, they had fled, and no information could be obtained of the means by which the rubies had come into their possession. They finally became the property of the Duke of Hamilton.

One of the strangest stories about an abandoned ship comes from the Indian Ocean. In 1822 the English corvette Lizard was cruising off Ceylon. A ship came in sight with all sail set and making good speed through the water. The English officers took a long look, and one said: "There is something wrong about that vessel. Her crojack is loose and flapping and there is no man at the wheel. We had better run down to her." This was done, and when near it was seen that the ship had no crew, as there was no answer to the hail. When boarded thre were no marks of trouble until on raising a sail that was spread over the main hatch the body of a man was found. He had been ironed to the lock bars of the cover and was apparently dead about a week. On going into the cabin the body of an elderly man was found. He had been stabbed to death. On examining the log book it was on record that the ship was Spanish, from the Philippines and named Eli Frey Antonio, but strangely the last entry was six weeks past and spoke of abandoning the ship at a point a thousand miles away, bound for Malaga, in Spain. She was left on the road to China. A pitcher of water on the table was intact. Could the vessel have come this long journey without meeting a storm, and how had the dead men got here? They ere not dead six weeks, and both were Lascars.

The Frey Antonio was taken into Madras, the Spanish Government notified, and their answer only made the mystery deeper. The ship had sailed from Celibes more than a year before with six Catholic priests as passengers, bound for Spain and had no Lascars among her crew, and this was all, and from that far away time until now the story of El Frey Antonio is one of the secrets of the deep.

As a general thing sea superstitions are foolish and senseless. The unluckiness of Friday is made rather hazy by the difference of opinion among sailors as to when a voyage commences, "when she leaves the dock," "first sets her top-sails," or "when the pilot leaves." The majority coincide with the last, so a vessel has chances against her who drops the pilot on Friday.

The dislike of old-time sailors for Finns in a crew arose from the belief that they could control the wind, and as they were very ill-tempered, they could hinder a voyage if angered, and this belief has not died out yet.

Miss ... held it at arm's length and surveyed it in silence through her glasses for some moments. At last a smile of triumph spread over her face.

"Yes, my dear, it is writtn in cipher, but it hasn't baffled my intelligence for long. Did your husband tell you where he was going this afternoon?"

"Somewhere in the direction of Bayswater, I fancy."

"Then I've got it—it's as plain as daylight. Look here"—and she ran her finger swiftly along the mysterious letters—'Be—at—Queen's Road—at 6 o'clock.' It's a secret meeting, Camilla, at the Queen's Road Underground Station!"

Camilla grew pale and clasped her hands.

"Do—do you really think so," she said?

"Think? Why, what could be plainer? The only question is, what had we better do?"

"I will ask him about it when he comes home," suggested Camilla, weakly.

"Stuff and nonsense, girl!" answered Miss Singleton, sharply; "as if that were the way to punish him! Why, he may never come home at all, and——"

"He canot mean——" broke in the other.

"Be quiet and listen to me. What time is it? Only 5? That gives us plenty of time. I will collect ten or twelve leadiig members of our league, anl all of us will go down to the station, and wait there till 6 o'clock. Then, when your husband appears, we will all shout 'Traitor!' at the top of our voices, and thus he will be properly punished for his crime. The story will be sure to get into the papers, and it will be a great and noble victory in the progress of the cause. Run, Camilla, put on your hat, and we will start at once."

But Camilla Dickson had regained her composure by this time. "Thank you Miss Singleton," she said, calmly, "but I am afraid that your plan will not do at all. However Fred has treated me, I am not going to make a scene in a

"Of your League, or whatever you call it, I hate them. I shall compel Fred to confess everything when he comes home."

Miss Singleton sighed. "Ah! it is weak-minded women like you that make our work so difficult. But your folly won't prevent me from doing my plain duty, and I [illegible] myself [illegible] terered the room, whistling cheerfully. What had happened at Queen's Road Station, she wondered; surely there must have ben a terrible scene. Yet Fred, although she dared not look at his face, seemed as cheerful as usual. He sat down comfortably in a chair nearly opposite her.

"Well, Camilla, and what have you been doing this afternoon?"

There was no answer.

PRINCESSES, WARRIORS AND DEMONS GIVEN TO THE LOUVRE.

The Natives Think They are Real—A Wily Medicine Man Makes Them Perform Strange Things Behind a Screen—Lay Figures That Talk.

An express waggon the other day, jolting over the mounds of muddy snow, carried from the Lyons station to the Louvre in Paris a queer medley of strange gods, princesses, warriors and demons. There were about 50 of them, all told, squeezed into a box of scented exotic wood—poor fantastic heroes that had been exiled from the island of Java.

Inclosed in a glass case in the Musee de Marine, these mighty legendary personages were transformed into curious marionettes, their grotesque appearance calling forth a pitying smile from the passer by. They had lost their divinity in leaving the far-away eastern sun. On their native soil, on the mimic stage of their bamboo theatres, they had received the adulation of a worshipful race; for days the [illegible] people hung entranced on the recital of their adventures; they wept with the unfortunate Madja Pahit and her companion, Argalatya, so deliciously pretty, with her long black eyes and her smiling little mouth, just revealing her golden teeth; they shivered with delight as they heard the sweet words which Manak Ing'ga, the Balembangan chief, addressed to Dencar Voulan (Light of the Moon); they were excited over the great strength of handsome Antaradja; they cursed the awful troop of demons led by Satan.

No people in the world are so fond of the theatre as the Javanese. A tree or a boat clumsily [illegible] hide is a suffial. It [illegible] centrating his attention upon the Fortnightly, while other magazines and reviews lay scattered broadcast on the table and the floor. The sight filled Dickson with astonishment; never before had the General been suspected of literary taste.

"What in the world are you about?" he exclaimed.

The Fortnightly was hurled impatiently to the ground.

"Hullo, Fred, old boy, is that you? Sit down here. I've had my fill of this dashed nonsense," and the General indicated with comprehensive gesture the debris of his study.

"So it appears. But what on earth induced you to begin on it?"

"Improving my mind, sir. Wherever one goes now the ladies expect to talk about this kind of rubbish and prattle about the New Woman, and so on, and the wonderful arguments in Mme. Somebody's last article. When I tell them I don't believe in stuff of that kind they say that this is because I am prejudiced; so I determined to give the thing a trial. Besides, my sister dragged me off to a meeting last night, at which a Miss Singleton spoke. Ever heard her?"

"No," answered Fred, "but my wife knows her, I think."

"Does she, by Jove? Then you had better look out for squalls, my boy. Gad, sir, that creature talked about the independence of woman and the tyranny of man in a way for which she deserves to be drummed out of the country. Well, I thought I'd see the business through, and so, having heard that old dragon last night, I've spent a couple of hours this afternoon in reading articles written by others nearly as bad. And now I shall be able to fight the ladies on their own ground next time they attack me. But I wouldn't let that Singleton creature into my house, if I were you."

Dickson laughed.

"Oh, I'm not afraid of Camilla joining the feminine revolt. And Mrs. Singleton's appearance always seems to me as powerful an argument as you could wish for against her own side."

"Well, it's none of my business," rejoined the General, "but heaven only knows what ideas that woman spreads abroad. Well, I've had enough of this stuff for one afternoon. Are you going home? If so, I'll walk part of the way with you. And mark my words, sir," he added, shaking an impressive forefinger, "a politician is a fool, a radical politician is generaly a knave as well, but a radical political woman is the very deuce itself."

And with this ungallant remark the General took his companion's arm and departed.

III.

Mrs. Dickson, having dressed for dinner, was sitting nervously in the drawing-room, while her face kept wandering between the clock and one of Miss Singleton's most fiery pamphlets, with which she was endeavoring to fan her failing courage. Presently she started as she heard the front door open. Fred had come back then, she thought, with an involuntary sigh of relief; at least her worst forebodings had proved false. With a hasty gesture she laid aside the pamphlet, and was apparently immersed in the Queen, when Fred en-

"Fred"—she ra and spoke very slowly—"what were you—doing—at that place?"

"What in the name of goodness are you talking about? Queen's Road Station? Why, I haven't been near it for two months."

"Sir, you were there two hours ago. You see that I know all."

"A precious sight more than I do myself, at all events,' rejoined her husband. "Camilla, what do you mean? Is it a riddle, or theatricals, or are you dreaming?"

"You cannot deceive me longer. I have for some time suspected you, and to-day, with Miss Singleton's help—"

"What in—"

"Silence, please—I have found you out. Yes, sir," she cried, rising from her seat, and suddenly producing once more the fatal postcard, "I know what this means."

Fred glared at it in open-mouthed astonishment for some seconds. And then, gradually realizing the state of affairs, he fell back in his chair—and roared with uncontrollable laughter.

Camilla burst into tears. "It is too cruel!" she sobbed.

At the sight of her distress Fred endeavored to compose himself. 'And what—what," he gasped, "did you take this to mean?"

They looked at the card together. It bore a single line, "B—Q. R's 6." "Why," her voice was choked with tears, "it means 'Be at Queen's Station at 6!'"

Fred relapsed once more into sonorous guffaws.

"Ho, ho! 'Be at—' Oh! ho! ho! Camilla, Camilla, what a goose you are! Why didn't you learn to play chess? It means, 'Bishop to Queen's Rook's Sixth,' and it is my brother's last move in a correspondence game that I am playing with him! And you and Miss Singleton thought—ha, ha, ha!"

Camilla looked up quickly, a light breaking through her tears. A moment's suspense—and she had thrown herself into her husband's arms, laughing and crying at the same time.

"Oh, Fred," she cried, "how can you forgive me!"

It was at this precise moment that the door suddenly opened, and Miss Singleton appeared, flushed, dishevelled and breathless. "Oh, Camilla," she exclaimed, impetuously, "there is some terrible mistake. We went in five hansoms, and waited an hour—and there was a rude crowd which jeered—and—why—what—does this mean?"

For she had now realized that here was Camilla in her traitorous husband's arms.

"It means," remarked that gentleman, coolly, "that for once in your life, Miss Singleton, you have made a slight mistake. It means that the preternatural society of the Feminine League is, for once, in fault. And it means, I fear, that the New Woman, despite her wisdom, is even more liable to blunder than the Old."

More than one trait in the Dalang recalls the bards of the Middle Ages, especially the fact that their memory is stored with ancient traditions.
they sing as they wander arou country. They know the countless sacred and historical poems of Java; they link them together, enlarge on them and oft times the epic which they are representing becomes so long and so complicated that the spectacle lasts nine nights running without wearying the audience, and this without rest on the part of the reciter, who directs the orchestra with one hand, using a wooden hammer, and moves his characters with the other.

If, however, his memory fail him for a moment, he extricates himself ingeniously by an imaginary combat and simulates the clashing of arms by striking an iron triangle with his foot.
A true Wayang should always end with a gory battle.

There are three different kinds of plays—the Wayang-Pourwa, the Wayang-Gedog and the Wayang-Karoetjil.
The two first named, the plots of which are borrowed from the remotest mythology, are acted by silhouettes manipulated behind a screen and lighted from behind, after the fashion of our shadow plays. The Wayang-Karoetjil plays are acted by carved wooden dolls, tinted and dressed in brocades and India stuffs, like the models recently placed in the Louvre collection.

Each figure is modelled after a traditional type, as well known to the people of Java as Pierrot and Punch are to us. A remarkable fact about this type is that, although it differs in expression according to the characters, it does not differ in construction. They all have—with the exception of the fantastic monstrosities—an angular face, large, full eyes, a long, pointed nose and thin lips, which in no wise resemble the thick-set features nor the dumpy figures of the inhabitants of Java.

In this dissimilarity can be traced a close connection between the population of the Sunda Islands and the primitive races of India, a connection which these religious marionettes make plainer to the present day student of races.
It is a very curious coincidence. As M.
Jules Lefaivre, French Consul at Batavia and the donor of the troupe of Javanese marionettes to the Louvre justly remarks: "If, on the one side, the contorted and grimacing figure of Satan, the genius of evil, singularly resembles the model adopted by the artists of the Middle Ages to represent the devil, the characteristic traits of the heroes of the Javanese theatre bear a striking analogy to the characters represented on the most ancient Egyptian monuments."

Where the Best Horses are Found.

The best driving and carriage horses come, I think, from Maine and Vermont, being tougher, as a rule, than the Kentucky horses, and no less intelligent. High-steppers for the most part are natives of Maine or of Canada.
Western horses, especially those from Indiana, Iowa and Ohio, are corn fed and soft, and they often lack that "quality" which the Kentucky horses derive from the thoroughbred strain in their blood. The best hunters—perhaps the best "combination" saddle and harness horses—come from the Genesee Valley, where there is a great deal of good blood and where real fox-hunting is pursued.

Valuable treatise * bottle of medicine sent Free to any Suffer[er] and Post Office address. H. G. [illegible]

A TERRIBLE SECRET.

Her hand never trembled as she wrote this letter. She placed the key in it, folded, sealed, and addressed it. It was dark by this time. As she knelt to cord and lock her trunk, she espied the writing-case within it. She hesitated a moment, then took it out, opened it, and drew forth the packet of Charley Stuart's letters. She took out the photograph and looked at it with a half-tender, half-sad smile.

"I never thought to look at you again," she said softly. "You are all I have left now."

She put the picture in her bosom, replaced the rest, and locked the trunk, and put the key in her purse. She sat down and counted her money. She was the possessor of twelve sovereigns—left over from Mr. Stuart, senior's bounty. It was her whole stock of wealth with which to face and begin the world. Then she sat down resolutely to think it out. And the question rose grim before her, "What am I to do?"

"Go out into the world and work for your daily bread. Face the poverty you have feared so much, through fear of which, two days ago, you sold yourself. Go to London—it is the center of the world; lose yourself, hide from all who ever knew you. Go to London. Work of some kind can surely be had by the willing in that mighty city. Go to London."

That was the answer that came clearly. She shrank for a moment—the thought of facing life single-handed, poor and alone in that great, terrible, pitiless city, was overwhelming. But she did not flinch from her resolve; her mind was made up. Come woe, come weal, she would go to London.

An "A.B.C." railway guide lay on the table—she consulted it. A train left Chester for London at eight o'clock a.m. Neither Lady Helena nor any of her household was stirring at that hour. She could walk to Chesholm in the early morning, get a fly there and drive to the Chester station in time. By tour in the afternoon she would be in London.

No though of returning home ever recurred to her. Home! What home had she? Her step-mother was master and mistress in her father's house, and to return, to go back to Sandypoint, and the life she had left, was as utter an impossibility almost as though she should take a rope and hang herself. She had not the means to go if she had desired, but that made no difference. She could never go back, never see her father, or Charley, or Trixy more. Alone she must live, alone she must die.

The flood-gates were opened; she suffered this last night as women of her strong, self-contained temperament only suffer.

"Save me, O God! for the waters are come into my soul!" That was the wild, wordless prayer of her heart. Her life was wrecked, her heart was desolate; she must go forth a beggar and an outcast, and fight the bitter battle of life alone. And love, and home, and Charley might have been hers. "It might have been!" Is there any anguish in this world of anguish like that we work with our own hands?—any sorrow like that which we bring upon ourselves? In the darkness she sank down upon her knees, her face covered with her hands, tears, that were as dreadful as tears of blood, falling from her eyes. Lost—lost! all that made life worth having. To live [illegible] die alone, that was her fate!

[illegible]ssed, hiding

ouche of Lady Portia Hampton was bowling along to Oxford street.

"What did you say to Sir Victor, Portia?" her sister deigned to ask. "What did he say to you?"

"He said very little to me—the answers he gave were the most vague. I naturally inquired concerning his health first, he really looked so wretchedly broken down; and he said there was nothing the matter, that he had been a little out of sorts lately, that was all. My conviction is," said Lady Portia, "that he has become dissipated. Purple circles and hollow eyes always tell of late hours and hard drinking. I asked him next where he had been all those ages, and he answered briefly and gloomily, in one word, 'Abroad.' I asked him thirdly, where, and how was Lady Helena; he replied that Lady Helena was tolerably well, and at present in London. 'In London!' I exclaimed, in a shocked tone, 'my dear Sir Victor, and I not know it!' He explained that his aunt was living in the closest retirement, at the house of a friend near St. John's Wood, and went nowhere. Then he lifted his hat, and walked away. Never asked for you, Gwendoline, or Colonel Hampton, or my health, or anything."

Lady Gwendoline did not reply. They had just entered Oxford Street, and amid the moving throng of well-dressed people on the pavement, her eye had singled out one figure—the figure of a tall, slender, fair-haired man.

"Portia!" she exclaimed, in a suppressed voice, "look there! Is not that Sir Victor Catheron now?"

"Where? Oh, I see. Positively it is—yes—he sees us. Tell John to draw up, Gwendoline. Now, Mary you shall see a live hero of romance for once in your life. He shall take a seat, whether he likes it or not—— My dear Sir Victor, what a happy second rencontre, and Gwendoline dying to see you. Pray let us take you up—oh, we will have no refusal. We have an unoccupied seat here, you see, and we all insist upon your occupying it. Miss Howard, let me present our nearest neighbor at home, and particular friend everywhere, Sir Victor Catheron. The honorable Miss Howard, Sir Victor."

They had drawn up close to the curbstone. The gentleman had doffed his hat, and would have passed on, had he not been taken possession of in this summary manner. Lady Gwendoline's primrose-kidded hand was extended to him, Lady Gwendoline's smiling face beamed upon him from the most exquisite of Parisian bonnets, Miss Howard bowed and scanned him curiously. Lady Portia was not to be refused—he knew that of old. Another instant, and the barouche was rolling away to Madame Mirebeau's and Sir Victor Catheron was within it. He sat by Lady Gwendoline's side, and under the shadow of her rose-silk and point-lace parasol she could see for herself how shockingly he was changed. He talked little—his responses to their questions were monosyllabic.

He was discouragingly absent and distrait. It came out by chance that the chief part of the past ten months had been spent by him in America.

In America! The sisters exchanged glances. She was there, no doubt. Had they met? was the thought of both. They reached the fashionable modiste's.

"You will come in with us, Sir Victor," Lady Portia commanded gayly. "We all have business here, but we will only detain you a moment."

He gave her his arm to the shop. It was large and elegant, and three or four deferential shop-women came forward to wait upon them and place seats. The victimized baronet, still listless and bored, sat down [illegible]wait and escort them back to the carriage before taking his departure. To be exhibited in the park was the farthest possible from his intention.

Lady Portia's dress was displayed—a rose velvet, with point-lace trimmings—and found fault with, of course. Lady Gwendoline and the Hon. Mary transacted their affairs at a little distance. For her elder ladyship the train did not suit her, the bodice did not please her; she gave her orders for altering sharply and concisely. The deferential shop-girl listened and wrote the directions down on a card. When her patroness had finished she carried robe and carp down the long room and called poise of the head and shoulders, anywhere. He followed her as fast as his strength and the throng of passers-by would let him, yet doing no more than keeping her well in sight.

Where Oxford Street nears Tottenham Court Road she suddenly diverged and crossed over, turning into the latter crowded thoroughfare. Still he followed. The throng was even more dense here than in Oxford Street, to keep her in sight more difficult. For nearly ten minutes he did it, then suddenly all strength left him. For a minute or two he felt as though he must fall. There was a spasm of the heart that was like a knife-thrust. He caught at a lamp-post. He beckoned a passing hansom by a sort of expiring effort. The cab whirled up beside him; got in somehow, and fell back, blinded [illegible]d dizzy, in the seat.

"Where to, sir?" Cabby called twice before he received an answer; then "Fenton's Hotel" came faintly to him from his ghostly looking fare. The little aperture at the top was slammed down, and the hansom rattled off.

"Blessed if I don't think the young swell's drunk, or 'aving a fit," thought the Cad, as he speeded his horse down Tottenham Court Road.

To look for her further in his present state, Sir Victor felt would be useless. He must get to his lodgings, get some brandy, and half an hour's time to think what to do next. He had found her; she was alive, she was well, thank Heaven! thank Heaven for that! To-morrow would find her again at Madame Mirebeau's at work with the rest.

At work—her daily toil! He covered his wasted face with his wasted hands, and tears that were like a woman's fell from him. He had been weak and worn out for a long time—he gave way utterly, body and mind, now.

"My darling," he sobbed; "my darling whom I would die to make happy—whose life I have so utterly ruined. To think that while I spend wealth like water, you should toil for a crust of bread—alone, poor, friendless, in this great city. How will I answer to God and man for what I have done?"

CHAPTER XXII.

The last night of the July day had faded out, and a hot, murky night settled down over London. At Poplar Lodge, St John's Wood, this murky, summer night all the windows stood wide. In the drawing-room two women sat together. The elder reading aloud, the younger busy over some feminine handicraft. Both wore deepest mourning—the elder a widow's weeds, the hair of the youngest thickly streaked with gray. They were Lady Helena Powyss, and Inez Catheron, of course.

"Eight," the elder woman said, laying down her book with a sigh as the clock struck. "If he were coming to-night he would be here before now."

"I don't give him up even yet," Inez answered cheerfully. "Young men are not to be depended on, and he has often come out much later than this. We are but dull company for him, poor boy—all the world are but dull company for him at present, since she is not of them?"

"I begin to think Edith will never be found," said Lady Helena with a sigh.

"My dear aunt, I don't. No one is ever lost, utterly, in these days. She will be found, believe me, unless—"

"Well?"

"Unless she is dead."

"She is not dead," affirmed Lady Helena; "of that I am sure. You didn't know her, Inez, or you wouldn't think it; the most superb specimen of youth and strength and handsome health I ever saw in my life."

"Perhaps so, and yet suffering tells—look at poor Victor."

"Ah, poor Victor indeed! But the case is different—it was only her pride, not her heart, that bled. He loved her—he loves her with a blind, unreasoning passion that it is a misfortune for any human creature to feel for another. And she never cared for him—not as much as you do for the sewing in your hand."

"It is natural," said Inez. "Think how she was left—in her very bridal hour, without one word of explanation. Who could forgive it?"

"No [illegible] not for that I feel [illegible] is her ever

Young ladies, I have said; and being unmarried, they are young ladies, of course. One of them, however, is three-and-thirty. It is the Lady Gwendoline Drexel. Her companion is the Honorable Mary Howard, just nineteen, and just "out."

Lady Gwendoline yawns drearily over a book and pulls out her watch impatiently every few minutes.

"What can keep Portia?" she exclaims, with irritation. "We should have been gone the last half-hour."

The Honorable Mary looks up from her Parisian fashion-book, and glances from the window with a smile.

"Restrain your impatience, Gwendoline," she answers. "Here comes Lady Portia now."

A minute later the door is flung wide by a tall gentleman in plush, and Lady Portia Hampton sweeps in. She is a tall, slender lady, very like her sister; the same dully fair complexion, the same coiffure of copper-gold, the same light, inane blue eyes. The dull complexion wears at this moment an absolute flush; the light, lack-lustre eyes an absolute sparkle.

"Well?" Lady Gwendoline says.

"Gwen!" her sister exclaims 'whom do you suppose I have met?"

"Being five o'clock of a sultry summer day, I don't intend to try. Tell us at once, Portia, and let us go."

"Then—prepare to be surprised! Sir Victor Catheron!"

"Portia!"

"Ah! I thought the name would interest you. Sir Victor Catheron, my dear, alive and in the flesh, though, upon my word, at first sight I almost took to be his own ghost. Look at her, Mary," laughs her sister derisively. "I have managed to interest her after all, have I not?"

For Lady Gwendoline sat erect, her turquoise eyes open to the widest extent, a look akin to excitement in her apathetic face.

"But, Portia—Sir Victor! I thought it was an understood thing he did not come to England?"

"He does, it appears. I certainly had the honor and happiness of shaking hands with him not fifteen minutes ago. It was driving up St. James Street, and caught a glimpse of him on the steps of Fenton's Hotel. Such a pallid shadow of his former self. You used to think him rather handsome Gwen—you should see him now! He has grown ten years older in as many months—his hair is absolutely streaked with gray, his eyes are sunken, his cheeks are hollow. He looks miserably, wretchedly out of health. If men ever do break their hearts," said Lady Portia, going over to a large mirror and surveying herself, "then that misguided young man broke his on his wedding-day."

"It serves him right," said Lady Gwendoline, her pale eyes kindling. "I am almost glad to hear it."

Her faded face wore a strangely sombre and vindictive look. Lady Portia, with her head on one side, set her bonnet-strings geometrically straight, and smiled maliciously.

"Ah, no doubt—perfectly natural, all things considered. And yet, even you might pity the poor fellow to-day, Gwendoline, if you saw him. Mary, dear, is all this Greek and Hebrew to you? You were in your Parisian pensionnat, I remember, when it all happened. You don't know the romantic and mysterious story of Sir Victor Catheron, Bart."

"I never heard the name before, that I recall," answered Miss Howard.

Lady Portia details at length the story of Sir Victor's marriage with Miss Edith Darrell.

"The story, though they tried to hush it up, got in all the papers—'Romance in High Life,' they called it. Everybody talked of it—it was the nine days' wonder of town and country. The actors in it one by one disappeared. Lady Helena shut up Powyss Place and went abroad; Sir Victor vanished from the world's ken; the heroine of the piece no doubt went back to her native land. That, in brief, is the story, my dear, of the interesting spectacle I met to-day on the steps of Fenton's. Now, young ladies, put on your bonnets and come. I wish to call at Madame Mirebeau's, Oxford street, before going to the park, and personally inspect my dress for the duchess' ball to-night."

Ten minutes later and the elegant bar-

...then, Sir Victor," the sharp, clear voice of Lady Portia said, at his side, "your martyrdom is ended. We are ready to go."

He led her to the carriage, assisted her and the young ladies in. How he excused himself—what incoherent words he said—he never knew. He was only conscious after a minute that the carriage had rolled away, and that he was still standing, hat in hand, on the sidewalk in front of Madame Mirebeau's; that the passers-by were staring at him, and that he was alone.

"Mad!" Lady Portia said, shrugging her shoulders and touching her forehead. "Mad as a March hare!"

"Mad?" Miss Howard repeated softly. "No, I don't think so. Not mad, only very—very miserable."

He replaced his hat and walked back to the shop-door. There reason, memory returned. What was he going in for? What should he say? He stood still suddenly, as though gazing at the wax women in elegant ball costume, swinging slowly and smirkingly round and round. He had heard a voice—he had seen a shapely head crowned with dark, silken hair—a tall, slender girl's figure—that was all. He had seen and heard such a hundred times since that fatal wedding evening, and when he had hunted them down, the illusion had vanished, and his lost love was as lost as ever. His lost Edith—his bride, his darling, the wife he had loved and left—for whom all those weary, endless months he had been searching and searching in vain. Was she living or dead? Was she in London—in England—where? He did not know—no one knew. Since that dark, cold autumn morning when she had fled from Powyss Place she had never been seen or heard of. She had kept her word—she had taken nothing that was his—not a farthing. Wherever she was, she might be starving to-day. He clenched his hands and teeth as he thought of it.

"Oh!" his passionate, despairing heart cried, "let me find her—let me save her, and—let me die!"

He had searched for her everywhere, by night and by day. Money flowed like water—all in vain. He went to New York—he found the people there he had once known, but none of them could tell him anything of her or the Stuarts. The Stuarts had failed, were utterly ruined—it was understood that Mr. Stuart was dead—of the others they knew nothing. He went to Sandypoint in search of her father. Mr. Darrell and his family had months ago sold out and gone West. He could find none of them; he gave it up at length and returned to England. Ten months had passed; many resemblances had beguiled him, but to-day Edith was as far off, as lost as ever.

The voice he had heard, the likeness he had seen, would they prove false and empty too, and leave his heart more bitter than ever? What he would do when he found her he did not consider. He only wanted to find her. His whole heart, and life, and soul were bound up in that.

He paced up and down in front of the shop; the day's work would be over presently and the work-women would come forth. Then he would see again this particular work-woman who had set his heart beating with a hope that turned him dizzy and sick. Six o'clock! seven o'clock! Would they never come? Yes; even as he thought it, half mad with impatience, the door opened, and nearly a dozen girls filed forth. He drew his hat over his eyes, he kept a little in the shadow and watched them one by one with wildly eager eyes as they appeared. Four, five, six, seven—she came at last, the eighth. The tall, slender figure, the waving, dark hair, he knew them at once. The gaslight fell upon her as she drew her veil over her face and walked rapidly away. Not before he had seen it, not before he had recognized it—no shadow, no myth, no illusion this time. His wife—Edith.

He caught the wall for support. For a moment the pavement beneath his feet heaved, the starry sky spun round. Then he started up, steadied himself by a mighty effort, and hurried in pursuit.

She had gained upon him over thirty yards. She was always a rapid walker, and he was ailing and weak. His heart throbbed now, so thick and fast, that every breath was a pain. He did not gain upon her, he only kept her in sight. He would have known that quick, decided walk, the

The ...d, his ...ar step ascended the stairs, not heavy and dragging as usual, but swift and light, almost as it used to be. Something had happened! They saw it in his face at the first glance. There was but one thing that could happen. Lady Helena dropped her book, Inez started to her feet; neither spoke. both waited breathless.

"Aunt! cousin!" the young man cried, breathless and hoarse, "she is found!"

There was a cry from his aunt. As he spoke he dropped, panting and exhausted with his speed, into a chair and laid his hand upon his breast its heavy, suffocating throbs.

"Found!" exclaimed Lady Helene; "where—when—how?"

"Wait, aunt," the voice of Inez said gently; "give him time. Don't you see he can scarcely pant! Not a word yet Victor—let me fetch you a glass of wine."

She brought it and he drank it. His face was quite ghastly, livid, bluish rings encircling his mouth and eyes.

He told them at last, slowly, painfully, of his chance meeting with Lady Portia Hampton, of his enforced visit to the Oxford Street dress-maker—of his glimpse at the tall girl with the dark hair—of his waiting, of his seeing, and recognizing Edith, his following her, and of his sudden giddy faintness that obliged him to give up the chase.

"You'll think me an awful muff," he said; "I haven't an idea how I came to be such a mollicoddle, but I give you my word I fainted dead away like a school-girl when I got to my room. I suppose it was partly this confounded palpitation of the heart, and partly the shock of the great surprise and joy."

Then there was a pause. The two women looked at each other, then at him, his eager eyes, his excited, wild-looking, haggard face.

"Well," he cried, impatiently, "have you nothing to say? Is it nothing to you that after all the months—months—great Heavens! it seems centuries. But I have found her at last—toiling for her living, while we—oh! I can't think of it—I dare not; it drives me mad!"

He sprang up and began pacing to and fro, looking quite as much like a madman as a sane one.

"Be quiet, Victor," his aunt said. "It is madness indeed for you to excite yourself in this way. Of course we rejoice in all that makes you happy. She is found—Heaven be praised for it!—she is alive and well—thank Heaven also for that. And now—what next?"

"What next?" He paused and looked at her in astonishment. "You ask what next? What next can there be, except to go the first thing to-morrow morning and take her away."

"Take her away!" Lady Helena repeated, setting her lips; "take her where, Victor? To you?"

His ghastly face turned a shade ghastlier. He caught his breath and grasped the back of the chair as though a spasm of unendurable agony had pierced his heart. In an instant his aunt's arms were about him, tears streaming down her cheeks, her imploring eyes lifted to his:

"Forgive me, Victor, forgive me! I ought not to have asked you that. But I did not mean—I know that can never be, my poor boy. I will do whatever you say. I will go to her, of course—I will fetch her here if she will come.

"If she will come!" he repeated hoarsely, disengaging himself from her; "what do you mean by if? There can be no 'if' in the matter. She is my wife—she is Lady Catheron—do you think she is to be left penniless and alone drudging for the bread she eats? I tell you, you must bring her; she must come!"

His passionate, suppressed excitement terrified her. In pain and fear and helplessness she looked at her niece. Inez, with that steady self-possession that is born of long and great endurance, came to her rescue at once.

"Sit down, Victor!" her full, firm tones said, "and don't work yourself up to this pitch of nervous excitement. It's folly—useless folly, and its end will be prostration and a sick-bed. About your wife, Aunt Helena will do what she can, but—what can she do? You have no authority over her now; in leaving her you resigned it. It is unutterably painful to speak of this, but under the circumstances we must. She refused with scorn everything you offered her before; unless these past ten months have greatly altered her, she will refuse again. She seems to have been a very proud, high-spirited girl, but her hard struggle with the world may have beaten down that—and—"

"Don't!" he cried passionately; "I can't bear it. O my God! to think what I have done—what I have been forced to do! what I have made her suffer—what she must think of me—and that I live to bear it! To think I have endured it all, when a pistol-ball would have ended my torments any day!"

"When you talk such wicked folly as that," said Inez Catheron, her strong, steady eyes fixed upon his face, "I have no more to say. You did your duty once; you acted like a hero, like a martyr—it seems a pity to spoil it all by such a cowardly rant as this."

"My duty?" he exclaimed, huskily. "Was it my duty. Sometimes I doubt it; sometimes I think if I had never left her, all might have been well. Was it my duty to make my life a hell on earth, or tear my heart from my bosom, as I did in the hour I left her, to spoil her life for her, to bring shame, reproach, and poverty upon her? If I had not left her, could the worst that might have happened been any worse than that?"

"Much worse—infinitely worse. You are the sufferer, believe me, not she. What is all she has undergone in comparison with what you have endured? And one day she will know all, and love and honor you as you deserve."

He hid his face in his hands, and turned away from the light.

"One day," they heard him murmur; "one day—the day of my death. Pray Heaven it may be soon."

"I think," Inez said after a pause, "you had better let me go and speak instead of Aunt Helena. She has undergone so much—she isn't able, believe me, Victor, to undergo more. Let me go to your wife; all Aunt Helena can say, all she can urge, I will. If it be in human power to bring her back, I will bring her. All I dare tell her, I will tell. But, after all, it is so little, and she is so proud. Don't hope too much."

"It is so little," he murmured again, his face still hidden; so little, and there is so much to tell. Oh!" he broke forth, with a passionate cry, "I can't bear this much longer. If she will come for nothing else, she will come for the truth, and the truth shall be told. What are a thousand promises to the living or quest—wearing himself to a very shadow looking for you. He has been to New York, he has hunted London—it has brought him almost to the verge of death, this long, vain, miserable search."

Her perfect lips curled scornfully, her eyes shot forth gleams of contempt, but her voice was very quiet.

"And again I ask why—why has Sir Victor Catheron given himself all this unnecessary trouble?"

"Unnecessary! You call it that! A husband's search for a lost wife."

"Stop, Miss Catheron!" she lifted her hand, and her eyes flashed. "You make a mistake. Sir Victor Catheron's wife I am not—never will be. The ceremony we went through, ten months ago, down in Cheshire, means nothing, since a bridegroom who deserts his bride on her wedding-day, resigns all right to the name and authority of husband. Mind, I don't regret it now; I would not have it otherwise if I could. And this is not bravado, Miss Catheron; I mean it. In the hour I married your cousin he was no more to me than one of his own footman—I say it to my own shame and dishonor; and I thank Heaven most sincerely now, that whether he were mad or sane, that he deserted me as he did. At last I am free—not bound for life to a man that by this time I might have grown to loathe. For I think my indifference then would have grown to hate. Don't come again to me—don't let Sir Victor Catheron dog my steps or in any way interfere with me. I am only a girl, alone and poor, but," her eyes flashed fire—literally fire—and her hands clenched, "I warn him—it will not be safe!"

Inez drew back. What she had expected she hardly knew—certainly not this.

"As I said before," Edith went on, "my time is limited. Madame does not allow her working-girls to receive visitors in working hours. Miss Catheron, I have the honor to wish you good-morning."

"Stay!" Inez cried, "for the love of Heaven. Oh, what shall I say, how shall I soften her? Edith, you don't understand. I wish—I wish I dared tell you the secret that took Victor from your side that day! He loves you—no, that is too poor a word to express what he feels; his life is paying the penalty of his loss. He is dying Edith, dying of heart disease, brought on by what he has suffered in losing you. In his dying hour he will tell you all; and his one prayer is for death, that he may tell you, that you may cease to wrong and hate him as you do. O Edith, listen to me—pity me—pity him who is dying for you!"

She flung herself on her knees, tears pouring over her face, and held up her clasped hands.

"For pity's sake, Edith—for your own sake. Don't harden your heart; try and believe, though you may not understand. I tell you he loves you—that he is a dying man."

"Get up, Miss Catheron," she said, "you must not kneel to me. What is it you want? what is it you ask me to do?"

"I ask you to give up this life of toil—to come home with me. Lady Helena awaits you. Make your home with her and with me—take the name and wealth that are yours, and wait—try to wait patiently to the end. For Victor—poor heart-broken boy!—you will not have long to wait."

Her voice broke—her sobs filled the room. The distressed look was still on Edith's face, but it was as resolute as ever.

"What you ask is impossible," she said; "utterly and absolutely impossible. What you say about your cousin may be true. I don't understand—I never could read riddles—but it does not alter my determination in the least. Let me go, Miss Catheron, I beg of you; you only distress me unnecessarily. If you pleaded forever it could not avail. Give my love to Lady Helena; but I will never go back—I will never accept a farthing from Sir Victor Catheron. Don't come here more—don't let him come. Again her eyes gleamed. "There is neither sorrow nor pity for him in my heart. It is like a stone where he is concerned, and always will be—always, though he lay dying before me. Now, farewell."

Then the door opened and closed, and she was gone.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Miss Stuart went back to the workroom,

"I will go," interposed Edith, turning away with a sick shudder. "Call the cab at once."

A four-wheeler was summoned—the insensible young baronet was carried out and laid, as comfortably as might be, on the back seat. Edith followed, unutterably against her will, but how was she to help it? He was her worst enemy, but even to one's worst enemy common humanity at times must be shown. It would be brutal to let him go alone.

"Don't you be afraid, miss," the chemist said cheerfully; "he ain't dead yet He's only stunned like, and will come round all right directly."

"Fenton's, Bill," and the cab rattled off.

REVENGE OF THE INDIANS.

One Way in Which the Red Men Are Repaying the Whites.

"That reminds me of a buffalo," said Augustus Bramedagee, former member of Congress, as he took a packet of cough drops from the train boy. "Whenever I see sugar or candy I think of the Indians and buffaloes. I suppose you won't guess why. Well, if you ever took a trip on the western part of the Canadian Pacific Railway you would. You travel for hundreds miles, and all you see in the way of freight are piles of white bones standing by the side of the track awaiting transportation. They are the bones of buffaloes long since dead, and the Indians collect them from the plains and take them to the track. There is a fellow in St. Louis who pays them something for them, $1 a ton, I think, delivered at the track side. The bones are used in sugar refining. I believe buffalo bones are better than any other kind for that purpose. Of course, the redskins sometimes try to ring in other bones, perhaps those of human beings. It is a strange thing," said the former member of Congress, as he chewed on a cough drop, "that the noble savage, who owes his extermination to the whites, should be able to get such a poetic revenge. The American people are said to owe many of their troubles to candy and sweet things, and there are those red-skins out on the Canadian Pacific road industriously collecting bones and doing their best by encouraging the production of candy."

A Cruel Use of the Electric Light.

Sir Herbert Maxwell, writing in the London Times, draws attention to a form of cruelty which, he claims, should be sternly discouraged. On a recent occasion he attended a most elaborately appointed dinner. The centre of the table was occupied by a crystal bowl in which were half a dozen gold fish. Among these an electric lamp had been introduced, and its strong light beat on the fish with an effect that must have been excruciating. Fish are extremely sensitive to light, not only in their eyes, but (some of them) over the whole surface of their bodies as is shown by the faculty possessed by trout of altering their color according to that of the ground over which they swim. The peculiarity which renders exposure to strong light intolerable to fish is that they have no eyelids. If the rays of light had struck the globe obliquely the harshness of their effect would have been to some extent modified, but the full brilliance of the lamp was brought close to the level with the fish, which had no cranny in which to screen their lidless eyes. Sir Herbert asks: "How would the guests have enjoyed their feast if the centre of the table had been occupied by a pillar of light six feet high, that being the proportion to their stature which the burner bore to the size of the gold fish." He believes that this is one of the thoughtless uses of the electric light, which will be abandoned as soon as those who have adopted it realize its cruelty. There is scientific warrant for this appeal. It is now that the f

During the night the cutter broke away, owing to the Ophir coming in collision with her. The men at once jumped overboard and commenced to swim, as they though, for the beach of Levuka, being unaware that the wind had changed to the west. After several hours' swim they reached the reef at Batiki, a distance of about 18 miles. After a short rest they started for the shore. The Rotuman reached the beach, but his comrade was either drowned or caught by a shark.—Auckland Herald.

HORSE THAT EATS PIE.

The Mince Variety is His Favorite and Cranberry Tarts His Delight.

Leonard Jacobs, a pie peddler, has one of the most remarkable horses in Connecticut, says the Baltimore American. Other towns have boasted of horses that chew tobacco, chew gum and drink beer, but Jacobs' horse will eat pie. The horse is 23 years old. Jacobs' pies come from New Haven, packed in cases, and in transportation some of them generally get broken and cannot be sold. One day Jacobs threw a broken pie on the ground near the horse's head. The animal smelled it, touched it with his tongue, lapped it up and ate it with a relish. Then Jacobs began to feed pies to the horse. The horse soon got to like them, and would even refuse oats when pie was to be had. The habit has grown on him, until now, when Jacobs says "pie" to him, the horse will turn his head and wink expectantly.

He has a decided preference for mince pies, and the more raisins and currants and cider there are the better he is pleased. Apple pie is not a great favorite with him. Most bakers put grated nutmeg into the apple pie, and that doesn't seem to agree with the equine taste. Pumpkin pie he likes, and cranberry tarts are an especial delight. Peach, apricot, berry and prune pies are acceptable, but unless the prunes are stoned he will not touch prune pie after the first bite. The horse is fat, chick and youthful in his movements, and Jacobs expects to keep him on the pie cart until he is long past the age when most horses are turned out to grass for the rest of their days, or are carted to the horse cemetery by the side of the murky waters of the Naugatuck River.

The Modern Pulpit.

Farmer Oatcake who, with his good wife, Mandy, is on a brief visit to a daughter-in-law in Buffalo, looked over the newspapers on Saturday in an endeavor to find a church service on the following day which he might attend with hope of securing spiritual satisfaction. He soon gleaned that the following Scriptural subjects would be discussed from various city pulpits:—

"Is the Trilby Craze Dying Out?"
"Fitsimmons vs Corbett."
"How the Pastor Spends His Vacation."
"Should Our Daughters Marry Foreign Noblemen?"
"High Sleeves and Theatre Hats."
"The Gold Brick Saloon."
"Canal Street on Saturday Night."
"Wordsworth and the Lake School of Poetry."
"The LIIId. Congress."
"Rights of Motormen."

Farmer Oatcake gave it up after a while, and laid down the paper, saying, with a sigh: "Laws sakes, Mandy! I do believe that the Gospel and the Scheme of Salvation have gone clear out of fashion."—Buffalo Express.

door. Long after, the two women sat together talking with pale, apprehensive faces.

"She won't come—I am sure of it as that I sit here," were Lady Helena's parting words as they separated for the night. "I know her better than he does, and I am not carried away by his wild hopes. She will not come."

Sir Victor descended to breakfast, looking unutterably pallid and haggard in the morning light. Well he might; he had not slept for one moment.

But he was more composed, calm, and quiet, and there was almost as little hope in his heart as in Lady Helena's. Immediately after breakfast, Miss Catheron, closely veiled, entered the cab with him, and was driven to Oxford Street. It was a very silent drive; she was glad when it was over, and he set her down near the shop of Madame Mirebeau.

"I will wait here," he said. "If she will come with you, you will take a cab and drive back to Poplar Lodge. If she does not——" he had to pause a moment—"then return to me, and I will take you home."

She bent her head in assent, and entered the shop. Her own heart was beating at the thought of the coming interview and its probable ending. She advanced to the counter, and, without raising her veil, inquired if Miss Stuart had come.

The girl looked inquisitively at the hidden face, and answered:

"Yes, Miss Stuart had come."

"I wish to see her particularly, and in private, for a few moments. Can you manage it for me?"

She slipped a sovereign into the shopwoman's hand. There was a second curious look at the tall, veiled lady, but the sovereign was accepted. A side door opened, and she was shown into an empty room.

"You can wait here, ma'am," the girl said. "I'll send her to you."

Miss Catheron walked over to the window; that nervous heart beat quicker than ever.

"You wish to see me, madame?"

A clear, soft voice spoke. The door had quietly opened and a young girl entered.

Inez Catheron turned round, and for the second time in her life looked in the face of her cousin's wife.

Yes, it was his wife. The face she had seen under the trees of Powyss Place she saw again to-day in the London milliner's parlor. To her eyes there was no change; she had grown neither thinner or paler; she had lost none of the beauty and grace that had won away Sir Victor Catheron's heart.

"I wished to see you. We are not likely to be disturbed?"

"We are likely to be disturbed at any moment. It is the room where Madame Mirebeau tries on the dresses of her customers; and my time is very limited."

The dark, grave eyes were fixed upon the close veil expectantly. Inez Catheron threw it back.

"Edith!" she said—and at the sound of her name the girl recoiled—"you don't know me, but I think you will know my name. I am Inez Catheron."

She recoiled a step farther, her dark face paling and growing set—her large eyes seeming to darken and dilate—her lips setting themselves in a tense line. "Well?" was all she said.

Inez stretched out her hands with an imploring gesture, drawing near as the other retreated.

"Oh, Edith, you know why I have come! you know who has sent me. You know what I have come for."

The dark, deep eyes met hers, full, cold, hard, and bright as diamonds.

"I don't in the least know what you have come for. I haven't an idea who could have sent you. I know who you are. You are Sir Victor Catheron's cousin.

Without falter or flinch she spoke his name—with a face of stone she waited for an answer. If any hope had lingered in the breast of Inez it died out as she looked at her now.

"Yes," she said sadly; "I am Victor Catheron's cousin and there could be but one to send me here—Victor Catheron himself."

"And why has Sir Victor Catheron given you that trouble?"

"Oh, Edith!" again that imploring gesture, "let me call you so—need you ask? All these months he has been searching for you, losing health and rest in the fruitless

...
...illustrious, so tastefully near,
...trustworthy in her work. Her companions disliked and distrusted her; she held herself aloof from them all; she had something on her mind—there was an air of mystery about her; they doubted her being an English girl at all. She would have none of their companionship; if she had a secret she kept it well; in their noisy, busy midst she was as much alone as though she were on Robinson Crusoe's desert island. Outwardly those ten months had changed her little—her brilliant dusk, beauty was scarcely dimmed—inwardly it had changed her greatly, and hardly for the better.

Madame's young women were detained half an hour later than usual that evening. A great Belgravian ball came off next night, and there was a glut of work. They got away at last, half fagged to death, only to find a dull drizzling rain settling down over the gas-lit highways of London. Miss Stuart bade her companions a brief good-night, raised her umbrella, and hurried on her way. She did not observe the waiting figure, muffled from the rain and hidden by an umbrella, that had been watching for her, and who instantly followed her steps. She hurried on and came to a part of the street where it was necessary she should cross. She paused an instant on the curbstone irresolute. Cabs, omnibuses and hansoms were tearing by in numbers innumerable. It was a perilous passage. She waited two or three minutes, but there was no lull in the rush. Then growing quite desperate in her impatience she started to cross. The crossing was slippery and wet.

"I say! look out there, will you!" half a dozen shrill cabbies called, before and behind.

She grew bewildered—her presence of mind deserted her—she dropped her umbrella and held up her hands instinctively to keep them off. As she did so, two arms grasped her, she felt herself absolutely lifted off her feet, and carried over. But just as the curbstone was reached, something—a carriage pole it appeared—struck her rescuer on the head, and felled him to the ground. As he fell, Edith sprang lightly out of his arms, and stood on the pavement, unhurt.

The man had fallen. A crowd surrounded the prostrate man. For Edith, she stood stunned and bewildered still. She saw the man lifted and carried into a chemist's near by. Instinctively she followed—it was in saving her he had come to grief. She saw him placed in a chair, the mire and blood washed off his face, and then—was she stunned and stupefied still—or was it, was it the face of Sir Victor Catheron?

She leaned heavily against the counter, feeling giddy and sick—the place swimming around her. Was he dead? Had he met his death trying to save her? "Blessed if I don't think he's dead and done for," said the chemist. "It ain't such a bad cut, neither. I say! does anybody know who he is?"

Nobody knew. Then the keen eyes of a policeman, X 2,001, fell upon Edith, pale and wild-looking, with evident terror and recognition in her face.

"I say, miss, you know, don't you?" Bobby suggested politely. "It was reskying you he got it, you know. You know this 'ere gent, don't you, miss! Who is he?"

"He is Sir Victor Catheron."

"Oh," said Bobby, "Sir Victor Catheron, is he? I thought he was a heavy swell." And then his eyes took in Edith's very handsome face, and very plain dress, and evident station, and he formed his own surmise. "Perhaps now, miss, you knows, too, where he ought to be took?"

"No," she answered mechanically; "I don't know. If you search his pockets, you will most likely find his address. You—you don't really think he is dead?"

"Well, no, miss, I don't think he is dead," the chemist answered, "though I must say he looks uncommon like it. Here's his card-case—now let's see; 'Sir Victor Catheron, Bart, Fenton's 'Otel'. Fenton's 'Otel. Bobby, I say, let's horder a cab and 'ave him driven there."

"Somebody ought to go with him," said X 2001. "I can't go—you can't go. I don't suppose now, miss," looking very doubtfully at Edith, "you can't go nuther?"

"Is it necessary?" Edith asked, with very visible reluctance.

"Well, you see, miss he looks uncommonly like a stiff 'un this minute, and if he was to die by the way or hanythink, and him halone——"

Anniversary Service Argyll Lodge No. 212, I. O. O. F.

Argyll lodge No. 212, I.O.O.F., and Mt. Ararat Encampment, reenforced by brethren from Dosoronto Lodge and many members of Napanee Lodge, No. 86, attended Divine service in a body in S. Mary Magdalene church on Sunday morning last. The occasion was the celebration of the 76th anniversary of the founding of Oddfellowship in America, which was planted firmly and securely on this continent by the late lamented Thomas Wildely, the founder of Oddfellowship in America, on April 26th, A. D. 1819. The procession, which was under the guidance of the efficient Marshall of Argyll Lodge, E. S. Lapum, formed at the lodge room about 10.30 a.m. and marched to the church where they were met and welcomed at the church doors by the Rev. Arthur Jarvis and the churchwardens, and conducted to their seats, the pews on each side of the central aisle being reserved for their accommodation. The procession was one of the best ever held here, and the members of Argyll Lodge are to be complimented on the excellent showing made by them, befitting as it did one of the strongest and wealthiest lodges in Napanee. Argyll Lodge is in a very prosperous condition, having about 80 active members, comprising some of the most prominent citizens of our town. The members presented a handsome appearance in their full regalia and silk tiles, and the Deseronto Oddfellows, who turned out nobly, were not one whit behind their Napanee brethren. There were about 80 in the march. While the Oddfellows were entering the church an excellent processional hymn was sung, after which the beautiful Matin service (1 Sunday after Easter) of the English church was gone through with, and greatly enjoyed by all present. The singing of the choir was excellent, the music rendered being grand and inspiring, an anthem "Why seek ye the living among the dead" being particularly fine. The rector, Rev. Arthur Jarvis, chose as his text, 1 Corinthians XV 26: "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death," and delivered an able and convincing discourse. He showed how Oddfellowship and the church went hand in hand. Like the church the Order was founded on the open bible, and unless the symbols of the society were meaningless, Oddfellowship and the church instead of being antigonistic to one another were each the completement of the other. He spoke of the noble philanthropic work of the society in relieving the distressed, visiting the sick, caring for the bereaved widow, and educating the orphan. His sermon was a splendid effort and was listened to with deep interest. The offertory, which was taken up by the following members of Argyll Lodge, D. Henwood, D. Frisken, G. Hawley, and F. McL Radford, was a very liberal one. The members of Argyll Lodge intend going up to Deseronto next Sunday to attend the anniversary service of Dosoronto Lodge.

Election of Officers

At a meeting of the Gold Cure Club the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: president, Irvine Parks; vice-pres., Anson Rose; treasurer, M. S. Madole; secretary, W. H. Perry. The club has an active membership of over fifty and are making preparations for sending another victim of the alcoholism to Oakville. Any of our citizens who may wish to become members of the club can hand their names to the treasurer with the membership fee of 50c, or as much more as they may be willing to subscribe. A committee, composed of Rev. A. Jarvis, Mayor Stevens, H. Hunter, J. J. Perry, W. G. Wilson and T. G. Davis, were appointed to make arrangements for an entertainment to be held shortly, and the club feel that they can appeal with confidence to the liberality of the people of Napanee in making it a success. The club meets every Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock in the R. T. of T. hall, in the Mills block.

George Burtch's New Sensation

Which will appear in Napanee Tuesday, May 7th, is the general talk of the community at present. The show is bran new from the ground up to the towering centre-pole, and with the 40 people who have been engaged to tour the coming summer, ought to present as strong an attraction as would do justice to some of the "Greatest." The large tent will be pitched on Wm. Miller's ground, nearly opposite the skating rink.

A Handsome Casket.

The casket secured by the Undertaking Establishment of Dafoe and Paul for the late Reuben Windover, of Forest Mills, was one of the handsomest ever brought to Napanee. It was a square casket, of an entirely new design, made of massive oak, with square silver handles at the ends, and heavy silver extension handles at the sides. The lid was fastened with ten massive silver thumb screws, and it had two heavy silver lifts. The workmanship and finish was the height of perfection. It was lined with satin, very tastefully put in. This is the first casket of this description ever brought to Napanee.

Vestry Meeting.

The adjourned vestry meeting of the church of S. Mary Magdalene was held in the church on Monday evening last. The financial affairs of the church were reported to be in a prosperous condition, their being a surplus on hand after meeting all outstanding liabilities. Messrs E. H. Baines and John Pollard were unanimously re elected churchwardens, the former as rector's warden and the latter as people's warden. Messrs W. H. Wilkison, T. E. Merrit, E. R. Checkley, R. A. Leonard and G. F. Ruttan and R. G. Wright were appointed sidesmen.

Cricket Club.

The annual meeting of the Napanee Cricket Club was held in the parlor of the Campbell House on Friday evening, when the following officers were elected:—Patrons, Judge Wilkison, U. Wilson, M. P., Mayor Stevens, Capt. A. F. Holmes and Mr. W. C. Scott; Hon. Pres., Mr. S. C. Warner; Pres., Mr. T. E. Merritt. Vice Pres., Mr. U. M. Wilson; Sec. Treas. Dr. R. A. Leonard; Captain, Mr. F. S. Richardson; Executive Committee, Messrs George E. Maybee, E. R. Checkley, W. T. Detlor, Fred Maybee, C. Trimble, Geo. Harrison, and C. Maybee. The club decided to join the Ontario Cricket Association. A communicaton has been received from Ottawa Cricket club asking for home and home games. The crease is in excellent shape and practices will begin this week. Two men have been working on the grounds and some fine cricket playing may be expected this season. The club expects the waterworks will be extended to the Park this spring.

REV. THOS. CLEWORTH.

It is with feelings of the deepest regret that we are called upon to chronicle the demise of the Rev. Thos. Cleworth, which sad event occurred at his residence in Napanee, on Tuesday afternoon, after a brief illness of three weeks duration. Deceased was stricken with paralysis, and from the first it was apparent to his friends that he would not recover from the stroke. The absent members of the family were at once dispatched for and arrived in time to be in attendance at the death bed of their father. He was 67 years and 5 months of age, and during his life was instrumental in bringing many souls to the Master. He was one of the pioneer Methodist ministers and went into the work when great obstacles and hardships had to be met and surmounted. He was an able expounder of the gospel of Christ Jesus, and carried away the respect and esteem of all the people over whom his pastorate extended. A few years ago he withdrew from the active work of the ministry and lived quietly in Napanee, preaching occasionly in different parts of the district. He was "the noblest work of God," an honest man, and the intelligence of his death, although at a ripe old age and full of honor, will be received with great regret by all classes in the community. The funeral took place on Thursday afternoon from the Eastern Methodist Church to the Napanee Cemetery and was largely attended.

OLIVER THATFORD PRUYN,

Sheriff of the county of Lennox and Addington, passed quietly away at his residence in South Fredericksburgh, on Thursday, the 18th inst., in the 79th year of his age. He has been ill for the past few month, and his death was not unexpected. Deceased was a prominent Conservative and done yoeman service for his party in his younger days, but was not an office seeker. He never applied for the position of Sheriff, but yielding to the solicitation of friends, and the request of Sir John A. Macdonald, he accepted the position of sheriff, and received the appointment in 1864. He was born in the 1st concession of South Fredericksburg and pursued the calling of a farmer, living on the farm, on which he was born, all his life. On his elevation to the sheriffship he appointed his brother, M. W. Pruyn, deputy-sheriff, a position he held for eight years, after which the late sheriff's son, T. D. Pruyn, of Napanee, was appointed to the position, and has filled it creditably, efficiently and satisfactorily for the past twenty-three years. Deceased was a man of good parts, a successful farmer, and much esteemed and respected for his probity and integrity. He was a warm personal friend of the late lamented Sir John A. Macdonald, and Sir Alexander Campbell, the late Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, a friendship, which, in the latter case, was only terminated by Mr. Campbell's death. Mr. Pruyn received a warm and kindly letter from him, written shortly before the Grim Reaper claimed him for his own. In his younger days the late sheriff was intimately acquainted with Sir Oliver Mowatt, and counted him as one of his warm friends. Deceased enjoyed the confidence and respect of his neighbors to a marked degree, and was a school trustee in his own section for a number of years. He was a member of the Anglican church, and a steadfast and consistent christian. He leaves a wife, one son, T. D. Pruyn, one brother, M. W. Pruyn, Napanee; and a daughter, Mrs. Geo. Ham, of South Fredericksburgh, to mourn his loss. The funeral took place on Sunday last to the Sandhurst cemetery and was one of the largest ever witnessed in that district, the procession being over a mile in length. The Rev. R. S. Forneri, of Adolphustown, conducted the funeral service and paid a touching and fitting tribute to the worth of the deceased. The following gentlemen acted as pall bearers: Messrs. Arch. Downey, Wm. Chapman, George Wartman, Wm. Hill, Thos. Gurrin, Allan Neilson.

HAY BAY.

The funeral of the late William Sharp on Tuesday last was very largely attended. The new Methodist church was packed to the doors. The sermon was preached by his pastor, Rev. H. I. Allen, from the text, "If a man die shall he live again." The Independent Order of Foresters, Court Hay Bay, of which Mr. Sharp was a member, conducted the ceremony of the Order in an imposing manner. He was interred in the Methodist cemetery at Hay Bay.

OF INTEREST TO WOMEN.

Mrs. T. Jones, of Colorado, died of excitement while preparing to cast her first vote.

The third biennial meeting of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be in London, beginning on the 19th June.

Mrs. S. Van Rensselaer Cruger is the Mme. de Stale of New York. She is more than Mme. de Stael was—she has beauty as well as brains, and is a society woman as well as a writer of books.

The two richest unmarried girls in the whole universe to-day are Alta and Edith Rockfeller, daughters of John D. Rockfeller, head of the Standard Oil concern. The much-talked-about fortunes of the Gould and Vanderbilt girls pale into insignificance when the Rockefeller wealth is mentioned.

The veil now worn by ladies of Egypt are as thin as those of Paris, London or New York. It is etiquette and religion that a Mohammedan lady shall be veiled; the Koran commands it, but says nothing about the thickness of the veil, so the ladies regulate that point to suit themselves. Most Moslem women, however, attach such importance to covering the face that when taken by surprise without a veil a woman will often catch up her skirt and veil her face with it, leaving the lower limbs bare to the knees.

One of the things that the fashionable woman picks up abroad now to hang in her drawing-room is a set of priest's vestments. These are used for window and door draperies, one hanging as a lambrequin over a wide window, with

A Shabby Fraud.

The meanest of impositions is the foisting upon a sick man a worthless substitute for the medicine that will restore him to health. The public is warned against worthless pills, sold in loose form, by the dozen, hundred or ounce, and against imitations purporting to be "the same except in name" as Dr. Williams Pills. The old fashioned Bland's Iron Pill, (colored pink) is falsely commended by some dealers as a substitute for Dr. Williams Pink Pill. Please bear in mind that Dr. Williams Pink Pills are not like any other medicine and no dealer can prepare them. They are sold only in wooden boxes, about two inches long, with circular of directions and wrapper printed in red ink bearing the full name "Dr. Williams Pink Pills for Pale People" Pills offered in any other manner are a fraudulent imitation and should be refused. Remember that Dr. Williams Pink Pills make pure, rich, red blood and cure when other medicines fail.

The conduct of a collector of taxes and his sureties for not making a return according to statute was the main issue in Trenton v. Dyer, in which the Supreme Court has given judgment. The defence was that the collector had not received a roll certified by the clerk, and depended on the only question argued, namely, whether the provision in section 120 of the assessment Act, 1892, that the roll is to be certified by the clerk, is directory or imperative, and that the collector could not act without the certificate. This view was sustained.

Of Interest To Those Ruptured.

Those of our readers who are ruptured, especially severe cases, who heretofore have perhaps the narrow casements in the same room conventionally decorated. These pieces of rich embroidery can be picked up in Spain, France and Italy at very low prices, and are regarded by the discriminating collector as a unique and attractive ornament. In using them as lambrequins or doorway drapings, breadths of soft silk of a contrasting or harmonizing hue are drawn through the openings made in the robes for head and arms, an arrangement which adds a pleasing grace to the rather stiff lines of the splendid pieces.

A London paper tell a story illustrating Queen Victoria's well-known strictness in the matter of precedence. As she was about to take a train with the Empress Frederick at Paddington station recently, she reached the door of her saloon carriage first ; she drew back at once, however, and motioned the empress to go in before her. The empress protested, and for a few seconds there was a little argument between mother and daughter as to which should have precedence, and the queen laughingly insisting, the empress finally entered before her mother. This was a striking example of the Queen's punctiliousness in observing the rank of her daughter and guest. Concerning the matter of precedence, it seems a little odd that the Duchess of York, who is the mother of the probable future ruler of England, is yet quite low in the ranks at court. The Queen's daughters and daughters-in-law all have precedence of her, and, according to Truth, her place at a drawing-room is between the Duchess of Albany and the Duchess of Teck. One wonders, if her son shall reach the throne, whether her rank will be raised.

THE DRESS OF MEN.

Some of the Absurdities of the Present Day.

Among the many definitions of man is one which defines him as the only animal that wears clothes. Now, this would be correct, if we added the word vertebrate ; for several of the lower animals do wear clothes, and wear them, too, with a sense of their fitness and sensible use that puts the bimanous vertebrate to shame. Among these animals who have solved the problem of rational dress are the hermit crab, the larva of the caddis and certain caterpillars. These clothes are rational in so far as they are fitting for whatever the wearers are doing (of course, the problem is simplified when the day's occupation consists of little else than eating and sleeping ; but how far below these creatures in our use of dress are we !

The lungs, as far as anatomy goes, are exposed at the back almost more than at the front. Yet man's clothing overlooks this fact. A man's shirt is at least three times thicker in front than at the back ; his waistcoat is always a mere lining at the back, and if, as the majority of men do, he does not button his coat, his back is sure to be much exposed. Take, again, the change from morning to night. During the day a man goes about with thick woolen clothes, thick socks, thick boots or shoes, with spats. At night he puts on very thin clothes, a waistcoat which is no protection whatever, thin shoes, silk socks, without any spats, and sallies forth to dine, after which, perhaps, a dance or a theatre. When arrived he congratulates himself that he is not as those poor silly women, who go about with the upper part of their chests bare. We are certain, however, that men catch cold from wearing evening dress far more than women do, and it behooves all who go out in the evening to keep the legs and feet warm, as well as the upper part of the body, and to wear an extra vest, to make up for the practical disappearance of the waistcoat.

Dear Sir,— It is with the greatest pleasure I wish to convey my appreciation of your skill and a desire that you add my name to your list of cures. Your success in my case may be an encouragment to other sufferers, especially those who have given up all hope of finding releif. I have been ruptured about six years, and was in a dangerous condition, being compelled most of the time to be in the saddle, and was led to believe that a rupture could not be retained during horseback riding, but your grand instrument, coupled with your skill, not only held me completely and in comfort all the time from the very moment you adjusted it, during the most severe exercise, but cured me in about six weeks I have no further occasions for its use, and find myself as well as ever, I may add that I was advised to call upon you by W. G. Murdoch, Esq., the well known barrister of this city. Very truly yours,

An Old Lady of Over 80 Years

HER RIGHT SIDE WAS BADLY PARALYZED.

HER SUFFERINGS WERE SUCH THAT SHE WISHED TO DIE.

Paine's Celery Compound Saved Her Life and Renewed Her Strength.

THE BEST MEDICINE FOR THE OLD AND YOUNG.

It is now an established fact that our dear fathers and mothers and our grandparents can have their lives prolonged, and their years made happy and joyous by the use of Paine's Celery Compound.

Many old people suffer from nerve troubles, rheumatism, kidney and liver complaint, sleeplessness, and terrible paralysis. With such dangerous diseases clinging to them, they are liable to drop off at any moment.

If we are truly and honestly interested in the welfare of the old people, we will anxiously seek to use the agency that will best meet their troubles. In the past, thousands of our aged people have been rescued from death by Paine's Celery Compound, and are now enjoying a happy old age. Every week new testimony is received from old people, as well as from their friends and relations, lauding the strengthening and rejuvenating powers of earth's best medicine.

Mrs. James Cain, of Perott Settlement, N. S., now in her eighty first year, has just sent in convincing and cheering testimony regarding the value of Paine's Celery Compound ; she writes as follows :—

"I am happy to state that Paine' Celery Compound has been a great blessing to me. In November 1893, the whole of my right side was paralyzed, and the doctor said I was too weak to take much medicine ; I managed, however to use a little, and was able to sit up for a short time, but felt so bad, that I wished to die, as I thought death would be a great relief to me.

"In my weak condition I began using Paine's Celery Compound. The first bottle gave me relief. I continued to use the compound, and I have gained health, strength and flesh, and my friends say I look quite healthy. Although in my eighty first year my limbs are getting stronger, and I hope soon to be quite myself again.

I would advise all who are suffering from paralysis and other troubles to use Paine's Celery Compound and the Wells' English Pills that accompany the compound, and if properly used, they will surely cure."

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, MAY 17, 1895.

PROTECTION ON COAL OIL.

Our esteemed contemporary, the Beaver, the champion of the Canadian coal oil monopoly, returns to "Protection on coal oil again" in its last issue, and succeeded admirably and to its own entire satisfaction in demonstrating that the little matter of a 100 per cent duty on coal oil is only a trifling affair hardly worthy of consideration. The Beaver is only consistent in its inconsistency, and in its vain attempt to explain away what is patent to everyone, it contradicts itself at every turn.

In its issue of April 26th the Beaver published an editorial article, "Protection on coal oil," which was so highly amusing that we decided to give it a wider publicity, and to this end gave the gist of it in our issue of May 3rd.

The Beaver's first article depicted in awe inspiring terms the increasing frequency of coal oil lamp explosions: the number of persons thus burned to death; the many others thus maimed for life; and the many homes and other valuable property thus destroyed. We were at first inclined to the opinion that the Beaver, while engaged in the laudable effort of "taking pains to know that correct facts and conclusions are supplied" had run across an article on nitro glycerine or dynamite and somehow got things mixed. But such is not the case. It was not oil of the attar of roses, lubricating or sperm, but simply coal oil it was talking about, and "every statement then made," it avers in its last week's issue, "was absolutely correct,"—or as true as truth has been of late in the Beaver. It was coal oil that was in the lamp that ignited the clothing of Mrs. Tovell at Toronto Junction, and it was coal oil that burned the outshed of the family whose home was saved from destruction with great difficulty. To set all doubts at rest as to the brand of oil used the Beaver in its last issue says: "We may as well state here that the Mrs. Tovell, of Toronto Junction, whose clothing was so badly burned because of the lamp explosion of American oil, died in the hospital next week." The fate of the family with the outshed, "whose home was saved from destruction with great difficulty," has not yet been ascertained, but if they still persist, after this terrible warning, in using the "cheap American coal oil," and this in the face of the fact that it costs 5c. per gallon more than the Canadian oil in Canada, they certainly deserve to be exploded to the "demnition bow wows."

It would be too much to expect the Beaver to be consistent for more than a week at a time. In its first article, on April 26th, it says that coal oil lamp explosions are due in almost every instance to the using of cheap American coal oils. In its issue of May 10th it lauds the Tory Government and the N. P. for its restriction prohibiting American oil that will not stand the "flash test" required in Canada, from entering our country. A little further on it asserts that American oil is not "cheap" at all, but is dearer in the United States to day than in Canada. And then the Beaver asserts that our oil producers could not exist without protection. It says: "should the duties be made any lower than they now are the business could not be made pay, and all Canadian petroleum works would be closed down."

The Canadian consumers have bonused the Canadian coal oil producers to the extent of over 100 per cent. Last year Canada imported $420,575 worth of coal oil from the United States, and upon this we paid $466,163 in duty. Or in other words the protective duty doubled the price of the for the many not for the few. Mr. Haycock, the leader of the Patrons in the Local Legislature, pointed out in a speech in the town hall at Napanee on March 8th that we used sixteen million gallons of coal oil per year in Canada. Of this we import six million gallons from America, on which we pay a duty of 100 per cent. This money paid in duty goes into the revenue of the country all right. There is ten million gallons of coal oil manufactured in Canada per year. The heavy duty on the oil allows the few men engaged in the business to put down in their pockets six million dollars annually. There is 11 oil refiner in Canada, employing 250 men. Take the duty off coal oil, pay those men the money invested in the business, give the 250 men employed $1.25 a day to sit on the fence, and after doing all this you will still have $400,000 left in your pockets on the investment. It is so much dearer to keep these "charities" running than it is to let them lie idle. But the N. P. men call this kind of thing "progress" and "prosperity."

The Beaver and all N. P. advocates seem to overlook the fact pointed out by J. E. T. Rogers in his preface to "Wealth of Nations" that the possible extension of other industries besides agriculture is due to the success with which agriculture itself is practised. And that it is only as the art of agriculture is excercised with increasing effect that the number of those not so engaged can be increased. It was pointed out by a writer in a recent issue of THE EXPRESS that "Protection discourages agriculture even where land is free and plentiful as in Canada. From 1881 to 1891 the number of farmers in Canada decreased 7000. During the same period the population of towns increased 38 per cent. hence the depression. Farm land values appreciated down to 1879, the year protection was introduced, since then they have fallen in value 40 per cent." Adam Smith says: "Had human institutions therefore never disturbed the natural course of things the progressive wealth and increase of the towns would in every politicrl society be consequential and in proportion to the improvement and cultivation of the territory or country." Protection is the "human institution" referred to here. A revenue tariff when in force in Canada did not "disturb the natural course of things." When N. P. advocates laud the increase of the towns, while the agricultural classes are decreasing they are lauding what the foremost writers on political economy have strongly deprecated. We desire to see Canada a country for the masses not the classes. We will hail with delight the abolition of the N. P., and the consequent arrival of the time when every man in Canada will be granted the privilege of selling in the dearest and buying in the cheapest market. Scarifying articles on the general "nastiness" of German sugar, or the "dangerous quality" of American coal oil, will not retard it.

PAPA GAVE IN.

A Ducking in the River and a Threat to Leave Him to His Fate Brought Him Around.

"Mountaineering is all very well in its way," said Col. Monkhouse, "but it only exercises the muscles of your legs. So, when I was young, I used to sandwich climbing with rowing.

"It was shortly after the little adventure with Rose North on Snowdon, of which I told you the other day, that rowing won for me my first wife.

"You see, it was this way: Our family and the Morris family had long been intimate, and it was only natural that Araminta Morris and I should fall in love with each other.

"So we did.

"I proposed to Araminta and was accepted; but man proposes and the father of the girl disposes.

"Old Morris liked me very well, but he would not hear of my marrying his daughter, his ground being that I was a younger son and was not overburdened with money.

"Three times I asked for his consent and each time I was refused.

"He was, however, quite pleasant over the matter and did not allow my pretensions to make any difference in our old social relations.

"So one day I suggested to him that I should take him and Araminta for a row on the river.

"He agreed. The day was very hot and Morris was decidedly fat. After a short time he fell asleep. I was making good use of the opportunity with Araminta, when suddenly the old boy tumbled overboard into deep water. As he came to the surface he managed to grasp the stern of the boat, whereupon I calmly rowed ahead.

"Clearing his mouth of water, he cried: 'For Heaven's sake help me, or I shall be drowned!'

"I rowed on. 'Mr. Morris,' I said, 'I have thrice asked you for the hand of your daughter, and you have declined my offer on each occasion. I now ask you for the fourth and last time to sanction the alliance.'

"Old Morris managed to gasp out, 'I'll see you blessed first!' whereupon I rowed nearer midstream. I was pulling harder now, and more water went down Morris' throat. 'I'll give in,' he said, and I promptly towed him to the towing path.

"Although he was none the worse for his wetting, Morris obstinately declined, to his dying day, to set foot in a rowing boat again."—Judy.

Fair Warning for the Court.

The unmarried woman of uncertain age was on the witness stand, and the prosecuting attorney, for some reason, was disposed to nag her.

"I believe," he said, "that you gave your name as Mary Howitly, unmarried?"

"I did," she replied stubbornly.

"And what is your age?"

"I decline to answer."

"But the court wishes to know."

"It's none of the court's business," snapped the witness.

"The witness will answer the question," frowned the Judge.

"The witness will do nothing of the kind," replied the lady.

"The court insists," said the Judge.

"And why?" asked the witness. "Will I tell the truth with less impartiality whether I am twenty or seventy?"

The Judge was thinking of a fitting answer when the prosecutor put in:

"May it please the court," he said severely, "this is contempt, and should be punished accordingly."

The witness smiled most exasperatingly.

"May it please the court," she said, in close imitation of the prosecutor, "you may fine me for contempt if you wish, but it will not make me answer. Your Honor and the gentleman who asks me the question are elected to the offices you fill by the people, and you are both willing to be elected again. Imprison me, if you wish, I shall not answer; but I will say to both of you now, that when the people know you have punished a woman for refusing to tell her age, you will never be elected to office again in a thousand years. Women have some rights that are bound to be respected, and public sentiment has accorded us this one. So there."

The Judge looked down at the prose-

THE ROYAL HOTEL,
Dundas Street, Napanee.

H. HUNTER, Prop.

This commodious hotel is centrally situated having every convenience for the travelling and business public. Large yard and sheds for farmers.

Good table, best of wines, liquors, and cigars The comfort of guests is made a first con-imported article for the benefit of the Petrolia oil dealers. When the price went up in the United States, a short while ago, owing to the determined effort of the Standard Oil Company, the poor suffering tax payers of Canada surely deserved a little recognition from our coal oil producers. The oil wells of Canada were not endangered by exhaustion, there was no panic in oil here, they were receiving more than a fair remunerative price, but notwithstanding all that the people had done for them, in bonusing them with a protection that they could not, according to the Beaver, have existed without, they followed the example of their fellow monopolists in the United States and advanced the price of coal oil, thereby showing their gratitude to the people of Canada by biting the hand that fed them.

But to return to explosions. We showed in a recent issue that lamp explosions were due in almost every instance to dirty burners. We also showed that the flash test of American and Canadian coal oils were the same. The American oil, however, as we said before is the cleaner of the two, and throws out a brighter light. Our information was received from a coal oil dealer in town, and several experts have substantiated our statements re the superior quality of American coal oil. The great trouble with the Beaver is that it mistakes assertions for facts, and no assertion seems to be too absurd for it to make. There is an old saying that "the proof of the pudding is in the eating," and this applies to oil, the proof being in the using. The scores of people in Napanee and vicinity who are using American coal oil, and paying the extra 5 cents a gallon for it, are not doing it from a mistaken sense of duty ; nor just for the fun of paying the extra price ; nor are they actuated by a desire to have their "clothing badly burned by a lamp explosion of American oil" and thereby die a lingering death in a hospital. They are buying it because of its superior quality and for no other reason. It is not clearly stated how the Beaver secured its information re the brand of oil used by the late Mrs. Tovell, but we presume that its editorial writer was near the scene of the catastrophe and took "pains" to ascertain the exact brand of oil used. It was American oil, of this the Beaver is assured, and on it there was a duty of over 100 per cent. A 100 per cent duty is only a trifling affair, and as the Beaver "takes pains to know that correct facts and conclusions are supplied," it figures out that if the duty were abolished it would not effect with many a saving over 2 cents per week. It is not stated of course, but we are inclined to the opinion that the Beaver in making this statement was referring to families who retire to bed shortly after sundown.

The Beaver has all along been whining that if the N. P. were abolished our manufacturing industries would be forced to close down. It is a well known fact that the N. P. has been a death blow to the manufacturing industries of Napanee. It has swallowed them up, and of the many flourishing industries existing in Napanee prior to the introduction of the N. P. nothing now remains but a remembrance and a number of empty and decaying buildings. As Labouchere, the talented editor of Truth, says: "All true life develops from within. No industrial undertaking has the seeds of success unless established on a commercial basis without the crutch of charity or philantrophy to lean on." The Beaver admits that the coal oil industries are not established on a commercial basis. That if the bonus of 100 per cent were withdrawn from them they would cease to do business. THE EXPRESS believes in legislation

EXPRESS-IONS

ON CURRENT ITEMS OF LOCAL INTEREST.

We hear a great many complaints about bicyclists riding on the sidewalks, and the question has been asked has the by-law governing such practises been repealed. We were unaware that there was a by-law of this discription. There are times and seasons of the year when the roads are totally unfit for a bicycle, and riders are quite within their rights in using the sidewalks, but at this season of the year when the roads are dry and in good condition the objection raised against the practice of riding on the sidewalk is a just one.

If there is a by-law of this discription we feel assured that there will be no necessity of calling it into requisition as now that their attention has been called to it the riders of the silent steed will we have no doubt, refrain from encroaching on the preserves of the pedestrians with the exception of that period when the mud renders the road impracticable for travel.

Speaking on this subject reminds us that the Napanee Bicycle Club intend holding a race meet here at an early date. The proposition should meet the hearty co-operation of our citizens, as gatherings of this description are beneficial to the town. Apart from the business done, and the money that it leaves here, it is a valuable advertisement, and the more Napanee is known the better it is appreciated.

The Oddfellows', of Watertown, are talking of running an excursion to Napanee this summer, and if they make up their minds to come our citizens should not let the duty of receiving them devolve entirely on the local Oddfellows, but should join heartily with them and assist in making the occasion a memorable one. Napanee should be a popular point for excursions, and when visitors strike town our citizens should take a particular pride in pointing out to them our advanced facilities, commercial, educational and geographical. The cricket club have expectations of a visit, shortly from a cricket club, of Chicago, and a kindly reception, not alone by the Cricket club, but by the town to the eleven of the Windy City might insure a second visit next year with the addition of a large number of their friends.

The Owen Sound Sun suggests that the council and the Board of Trade appoint a reception committee to show visitors to that place the points of interest in the town. This is not a bad idea, but it will have to fall on the shoulders of the council here for our once robust Board of Trade is dead. Warden Carson and Deputy-Reeve Symington made a laudable attempt to resurrect it last year but their efforts met with no response. Not even the inducement held out by the Deputy-Reeve in his announcement that there was a sum of money in the treasury was sufficient to call the members of the Board together and it died of inactivity, full of years and honor, and with a plethoric treasury.

Anxious Mother—I'm afraid, doctor, that poor Willie has got his death. He ate too many hard-boiled eggs yesterday——

Doctor—Ahem! How—ah—many did he eat, mam?

"Oh, he says half a dozen, but I fear the dear child is deceivin' me——"

Willie (from pillow)—I—et—two—dozen—hen aigs 'n——

Mother—Mercy on us! And what, child?

Willie—An' two goose aigs!

Doctor—There is no need of my services, mam! I thought the boy had overeaten, mam. But you evidently don't know the Easter boy, mam! Should he become nervous during the night give him a couple or three good-sized doughnuts and half a dozen apples. Good evening, mam!—Cleveland Plaindealer.

Perverted Proverbs.

"Did you ever surrender yourself to the police?" asked Plodding Pete.

"No, sir," replied Meandering Mike, "I'm a firm believer in the principle that the officer should seek the man ; not the man the officer."

Not Understood in the North.

"Yankees have a knack of pronouncing words in a most outlandish way," remarked a gentleman from New Orleans.

"I am on my way home from Buffalo. While I was in Buffalo I got a trifle mixed up about the streets. In fact, I was lost. I stopped a gentleman and asked him where I could get a car (pronouncing it kor, as we do down south.

The gentleman was evidently puzzled; and after thinking a moment, said : "What did you say you wanted?"

"Why, a car," I replied.

"'A kor,' he said, 'what's that? How do you spell it?'

"That made me rather angry and I answered: 'Great goodness! Can't you people up here understand English? C-a-r, kor.'

"'Oh! I know what you mean now,' he said, 'you mean a car' (pronouncing it exactly like car)." Cincinnati Tribune.

No Closed Door.

The difference between the Chinese and Europeans is brought out by this extract from the Rev. Arthur Smith's book, "Chinese Characteristics." In China, private houses are surrounded by a wall, and have no windows looking on the street. Nevertheless, there is no domestic privacy in China. No one thinks of objecting to the entrance of perfect strangers through the ever-open door. To close the door would provoke the inquiry :

"What is going on within, that they are afraid to have every one see and hear?"

And from that moment the social doom of the family would be sealed. The Occidental question to an intruder would be, "What business have you here?"

The Oriental reply would be, "What business have you to keep me out?" The Chinese adage covering this matter is, "If you would not have it known that you do it, do not do it."

RESENTED THE TEST.

How Both His Wife and His Tongue Got the Best of John.

It wasn't late when the Pitcher street man came home, and notwithstanding he walked in with a smile and sat down on the other side of the lamp-stand from his wife, and picked up a newspaper, as men do when they come home, she, for some unaccountable reason, suspected him. She looked up over her work at him two or three times, and finally spoke:

"By the way, John," she said, "will you do me a favor?"

"Certainly, my dear. What is it?" said John.

"I want you to say this for me: 'Gaze on the gay gray brigade.'"

"Graze on the gray gay bigrade," replied John triumphantly.

"Lovely," she exclaimed. "Now, try this one: 'Give Grimes Jim's gilt gig whip.'"

"Grive Jimes Gim's gig jilt whip," responded John, as glibly as you please.

"Excellent, excellent," cried she. "Now this one: 'Sarah in a shawl shoveled soft snow softly.'"

He shivered a little, but never let on. "Sharah in a sawl sovel d shoft snow softly," he said, with oratorical effect.

"Oh, you dear old thing," she laughed. "Now one more, and then I won't trouble you again."

"No trouble, I assure you, my dear," said John. "Go a'ead."

"Well, say this: 'Say, should such a shapely sash such shabby stitches show?'"

John gave a great gasp. "My dear," he said slowly, "I begin to shuspect that you shuspicion me; but you are mistaken—entirely mistaken and I positively decline to pose further as a pronouncing dictionary. You have observed that I have made a shueshess as far as I have gone, but there is a limit and the next thing I know you will be asking me to say 'the scene was tuly rural,' a thing I never could say without getti g my twongue tisted and you will think your shuspicions are w l grounded, wh n you ought to know th y are not," and John buried himself in his newspaper and utterly refused to hear any further appeals from the other side of the table.—Detroit Free Press.

Disappointed.

Mrs. Wickwire threw down the paper in a way that betokened some irritation.

"What's the matter, dear?" asked Mr. Wickwire.

"Oh, nothing."

"Oh, yes, there was something. What was it?"

"Well, if you must know, I saw a line in the paper about 'Chinese worsted,' and it turned out to be something about that tiresome war. I thought it was some new kind of dress goods."—Indianapolis Journal.

CHAPTER XXX.

Miss Nellie Seton came early next morning to see her friend, Mr. Charley Stuart, off. He is looking rather pale as he bids them good-by—the vision of Edith's eyes upturned to his, full of mute impassionate appeal, have haunted him all night long. They haunt him now, long after the last good-by had been said, and the train is sweeping away Westward. Edith loves him at last. At last? there has never been a time when he doubted it, but now he knows he has but to say the word, and she will lay her hand in his, and toil, and parting, and separation will end between them forever. But he will never say that word—what Edith Darrell in her ambition once refused, all Lady Catheron's wealth and beauty cannot win. He feels he could as easily leap from the car window and end it all, as ask Sir Victor Catheron's richly dowered widow to be his wife. She made her choice three years ago—she must abide by that choice her life long.

"And then," he thinks rather doggedly, "this fancy of mine may be only fancy. The leopard cannot change his spots, and an ambitious, mercenary woman cannot change her nature. And, as a rule, ladies of wealth and title don't throw themselves away on impecunious dry goods clerks. No! I made an egregious ass of myself once, and once is quite enough. We have turned over a new leaf, and are not going back at this late day to the old ones. With her youth, her fortune, and her beauty, Edith can return to England and make a brilliant second marriage."

And then Mr. Stuart sets his lips behind his brown mustache, and unfolds the morning paper, smelling damp and nasty of printer's ink, and immerses himself, fathoms deep in mercantile news and the doings of the Stock Exchange.

He reaches St Louis in safety, and resumes the labor of his life. He has no time to think—no time to be sentimental, if he wished to be, which he doesn't.

"Love is of man's life a thing apart," sings the poet, who knew what he was talking about. His heart is not in the least broken, nor likely to be; there is no time in his busy, mercantile life, for that sort of thing, I repeat. He goes to work with a will, and astonishes even himself by his energy and brisk business capacity. If he thinks of Edith at all, amid his dry-as-dust ledgers and blotters, his buying and selling, it is that she is probably on the ocean by this time—having bidden her native land, like Childe Harold, "One long, one last, good-night." And then, in the midst of it all, Trixy's first letter arrives.

It is all Edith, from beginning to end. Edith has not gone, she is still in New York, but her passage is taken, and she will leave next week. "And Charley," says Trixy, "I am not to grieve for me, Trixy—I never made anything but trouble, and disappointment, and wretchedness. I am sorry—sorry now, and my last wish and prayer will be for the happiness of his life.' When she is delirious, and she mostly is as night draws on, she calls for you incessantly—asking you to come back—begging you to forgive her. That is why I sent."

"Does she know you sent?" he asks.

"No—it was her desire you should not be told until—until all was over," Trix answered with another burst of tears; "but I couldn't do that. She says we are to bury her at Sandypoint, beside her mother—not send her body to England. She told me, when she was dead, to tell you the story of her separation from Sir Victor. Shall I tell it to you now, Charley?"

He makes a motion of assent; and Trix begins, in a broken voice, and tells him the sad, strange story of the two Sir Victors, father and son, and of Edith's life from her wedding-day. The twilight deepens into darkness, the room is wrapped in shadow long before she has finished. He never stirs, he never speaks, he sits and listens to the end. Then there is a pause, and out of the gloom he speaks at last:

"May I see her, and when?"

"As soon as you come, the doctors say; they refuse her nothing now, and they think your presence may do her good—if anything can do it. Mother is with her and Nellie; Nellie has been her best friend and nurse; Nellie has never left her, and Charley," hesitatingly, for something in his manner awes Trix, "I believe she thinks you and Nellie are engaged."

"Stop!" he says imperiously, and Trixy rises with a sigh and puts on her hat and shawl. Five minutes later they are in the street, and on their way to Lady Catheron's hotel.

One of the medical men is in the sick-room when Miss Stuart enters it, and she tells him in a whisper that her brother has come, and is waiting without.

His patient lies very low to-night—delirious at times, and sinking, it seems to him, fast. She is in a restless, fevered sleep at present, and he stands looking at her with a very sombre look on his professional face. In spite of his skill, and he is very skilful, this case baffles him. The patient's own utter indifference, as to whether she lives or dies, being one of the hardest things he has to combat. If she only longed for life, and strove to recruit—if, like Mrs. Dombey she would "only make an effort." But she will not, and the flame flickers, and flickers, and very soon will go out altogether.

"Let him come in," the doctor says. "He can do no harm—he may possibly do some good."

"Will she know him when she awakes?" Trix whispers.

He nods and turns away to where Miss Seton stands in the distance, and Trix goes and fetches her brother in. He advances slowly, almost reluctantly it would seem, and looks down at the wan, drawn, thin face that rests there, whiter than the pillow. He looks down at it for a long time in silence, then he turns to the doctor, who is standing at the footboard, and asks in a low voice:

"Is there any hope?"

"Very little," the doctor answers, "I am sorry to say. She has no desire to live, and that is always fatal. Her mind is wandering, and she is constantly calling for you. Perhaps you can rouse her to a sense of her present surroundings. It is worth trying, at all events."

He bends down, and looks at her with a long, steady look, then he takes her hand in his, and says, in a voice that thrills through the room:

"Edith!"

She starts, and her eyes open, and look at him with a look of wild surprise.

"Edith!" he says again, "look at me—speak to me—I have come back to you."

She looks at him, and then a faint, sweet smile breaks over her face, and she says, in a voice that is scarcely audible:

"Charley!"

"Yes, Edith, Charley—Charley who loves you, and who has come back to you. Look at me, Edith, and tell me you are glad I have come."

"I am glad," she says, in the same faint voice, "I am glad you have come back to me, Charley."

"Edith, my darling, you must get well—you must live for my sake. I cannot lose you now that I have found you. Edith, you must live!"

"I will live for your sake, Charley," she says, in that faint, sweet voice.

"Edith, you love me?"

"I love you, Charley."

"Edith, you will be my wife?"

"Edith, you will live for my sake?"

Trix, "don't be angry now, but do you know, though Edith Darrell always liked you, I fancy Lady Catheron likes you even better. Not that she ever says anything; bless you! she is as proud as ever; but we women can tell. And last night she told ma and me the story of her past, of her married life—or rather her un-married life—of her separation from Sir Victor on their wedding-day—think of it, Charley! on their wedding-day. If ever anyone in this world was to be pitied, it was he—poor fellow! And she was not to blame—neither could have acted other than they did, that I can see. Poor Edith! poor Sir Victor! I will tell you all when we meet. She leaves next Tuesday, and it half breaks my heart to see her go. Oh, Charley! Charley! why need she go at all?"

He reads this letter as he smokes his cigar—very gravely, very thoughtfully, wondering a great deal, but not in the least moved from his steadfast purpose. Parted on their wedding-day! he has heard that before, but hardly credited it. It was true then—odd that; and neither to be blamed—odder still. She has only been Sir Victor's wife in name, then, after all. But it makes no difference to him—nothing does—all that is past and done—she flung him off once—he will never go back now. Their paths lie apart—hers over the hills of life, his in the dingy valleys—they have said good-by, and it means forever.

He goes back to his ledgers and his counting-room, and four more days pass. On the evening of the fourth day, as he leaves the store for the night, a small boy from the telegraph office waylays him, and hands him one of the well-known buff envelopes. He breaks it open where he stands, and read this:

"NEW YORK, Oct. 28, '70.

"Charley: Edith is lying dangerously ill—dying. Come back at once.

"BEATRIX."

He reads, and the truth does not come to him—he reads it again. Edith is dying. And then a grayish pallor comes over his face, from brow to chin, and he stands for a moment, staring vacantly at the paper he holds, seeing nothing—hearing nothing but these words: "Edith is dying." In that moment he knows that all his imaginary hardness and indifference have been hollow and false—a wall of pride that crumbles at a touch, and the old love, stronger than death, fills his heart still. He had left her, and—Edith is dying! He looks at his watch. There is an Eastward-bound train in half an hour—there will be barely time to catch it. He does not return to his boarding house—he calls a passing hack, and is driven to the depot just in time. He makes no pause from that hour—he travels night and day. What is business; what the prospects of all his future life; what is the whole world now? Edith is dying.

He reaches New York at last. It seems like a century since that telegram came, and haggard and worn in the twilight of the autumn day, he stands at last in his mother's home.

Trix is there—they expect him to-night, and she has waited to receive him. She looks in his face once, then turns away and covers her own, and bursts into a woman's tempest of tears.

"I—I am too late," he says in a hoarse whisper.

"No," Trix answers, looking up; "not too late. She is alive still—I can say no more."

"What is it?" he asks.

"It is almost impossible to say. Typhoid fever, one doctor says, and cerebro spinal meningitis says the other. It doesn't much matter what it is, since both agree in this—that she is dying."

Her sobs break forth again. He sits and gazes at her like a stone.

"There is no hope?"

"While there is life there is hope." But it is in a very dreary voice that Trix repeats this aphorism: "and—the worst of it is, she doesn't seem to care. Charley, I believe she wants to die, is glad to die. She seems to have nothing to care for—nothing to live for. 'My life has been all a mistake,' she said to me the other day. 'I have gone wrong from first to last, led astray by my vanity, and selfishness, and ambition. It is much better that I should die, and make an end of it all.' She has made her will, Charley—she made it in the first days of her illness, and—she has left almost everything to you."

He makes no reply. He sits motionless in the twilit window, looking down at the noisy, bustling street.

"She has remembered me most generously," Trix goes softly on; "poor, darling Edith! but she has left almost all to you. 'It would have been an insult to offer anything in my lifetime,' she said to me; 'but the wishes of the dead are sacred,—he will not be able to refuse it then. And tell him

Great Heaven! and this—this is Edith! He sinks into a chair by the bed-side, and takes her wan, transparent hand in both his own, with a sort of groan. The light touch awakes her, the faint eyelids quiver, the large dark eyes open and fix on his face. The lips flutter breathlessly apart. "Charley!" they whisper in glad surprise, and over the death-like face there flashes for a second an electric light of great amaze and joy.

"Humph!" says the doctor, with a surprised grunt; "I thought it would do her no harm. If we leave them alone for a few minutes, my dear young ladies, it will do us no harm either. "Mind, my young gentleman," he taps Charley on the shoulder, "my patient is not to excite herself talking."

They softly go out. It would appear the doctor need not have warned him; they don't seem inclined to talk. She lies and looks at him, delight in her eyes, and draws a long, long breath of great content. For him, he holds her wasted hand a little tighter, and lays his face down on the pillow, and does not speak a word.

So the minutes pass.

"Charley," she says at last, in a faint, little whisper, "what a surprise this is. They did not tell me you were coming. Who sent for you? when did you come?"

"You're not to talk, Edith," he answers, lifting his haggard face for a moment—poor Charley? "Trix sent for me." Then he lays it down again.

"Foolish boy!" Edith says with shining eyes; "I do believe you are crying. You don't hate me, then, after all, Charley?"

"Hate you!" he can but just repeat.

"You once said you did, you know; and I deserved it. But I have not been happy, Charlie—I have been punished as I merited. Now it is all over, and it is better so—I never was of any use in the world, and never would be. You will let me atone a little for the past in the only way I can. Trix will tell you. And, by and by, when you are quite happy, and she is your wife——"

The faint voice breaks, and she turns her face away. Even in death it is bitterer than death to give him up.

He lifts his head, and looks at her.

"When she is my wife? when who is my wife?" he asks.

"Nellie—you know," she whispers; "she is worthy of you, Charley—indeed she is, and I never was. And she loves you, and will make you hap——"

"Stop!" he says suddenly; "you are making some strange mistake, Edith. Nellie cares for me, as Trix does, and Trix is not more a sister to me than Nellie. For the rest—do you remember what I said to you that night at Killarney?"

Her lips tremble—her eyes watch him, her weak fingers close tightly over his. Remember! does she not?

"I said—'I will love you all my life!' I have kept my word, and mean to keep it. If I may not call you wife, I will never call, by that name, any other woman. No one in this world can ever be to me again, what you were and are."

There is another pause, but the dark, uplifted eyes are radiant now.

"At last! at last!" she breathes; "when it is too late. Oh, Charley! If the past might only come over again, how different it all would be. I think;"—she says this with a weak little laugh, that reminds him of the Edith of old—"I think I could sleep more happily even in my grave—if 'Edith Stuart' were carved on my tombstone!"

His eyes never leave her face—they light up in their dreary sadness now at these words.

"Do you mean that, Edith?" he says bending over her; "living or dying, would it make you happier to be my wife?"

Her eyes, her face, answer him. "But it is too late," the pale lips sigh.

"It is never too late," he says quietly; "we will be married to-night."

"Charley?"

"You are not to talk," he tells her, kissing her softly and for the first time; "I will arrange it all. I will go for a clergyman I know, and explain everything. Oh, darling! you should have been my wife long ago—you shall be my wife at last, in spite of death itself."

Then he leaves her, and goes out. And Edith closes her eyes, and lies still, and knows that never in all the years that are gone has such perfect bliss been hers before. In death, at least, if not life, she will be Charley's wife.

He tells them very quietly, very resolutely—her father who is there from Sandypoint, his mother, sister, Nellie, the doctor.

They listen in wordless wonder; but what can they say?

"The excitement will finish her—mark my words," is the doctor's verdict; "I will never countenance any such melo-dramatic her unconscious head.

And for those who loved her, her father, her friends, and one other, nearer and dearer than father or friend, how went those darkest days for them? They could hardly have told—all their after life they looked back, with a sick shudder, to that week.

For Charley Stuart he never wants to look back—never to the last day of his life will he be able to recall, to realize the agony of those six days—days that changed his whole nature—his whole life.

They watched with her unceasingly—death might come at any moment. There were times when they bent over her, holding their own breath, sure that the faint thread had already snapped—times when they held a mirror to her lips to be sure she breathed at all. For her new-made husband, he never left her except when nature succumbed to the exhaustion of ceaseless vigil, and they forced him away. He forgot to eat or sleep, he sat tearless and still as stone by the bedside, almost as bloodless, almost as wan and hollow-eyed as the dying bride herself. The doctors stood gloomily silent, their skill falling powerless here.

"She needed only the excitement of this most preposterous marriage to finish her," one of them growled; "I said so at the time—I say so now. She had one chance for life—perfect quiet—and that destroyed it."

On the fourth day, a letter from England, in a woman's hand, and deeply bordered with black, arrived. Edith, in the first days of her illness, had told Trix to open all her letters. She would have passed the power over to her brother now, but he waved it away impatiently. What did it matter whom it was from—what it contained—what did anything matter now?

His haggard eyes went silently back to the marble face lying among its pillows, to awfully still.

Trixy opened and read it. It was from Inez Catheron, and announced the death of her aunt, the Lady Helena Powyss.

"Her end was perfect peace," said the letter; "and in her will, she has left her large fortune divided equally between you and me. If possible it would be well for you to return to England as speedily as may be. If wealth can make you happy—and I hope at least it will aid—my dearest Edith, you will have it. For me, I join a charitable Sisterhood here in London, and will try to devote the remainder of my life to the relief of my suffering and poor fellow-creatures. As to the rest, if you care at all to know, my brother reigns at Catheron Royals now! He is, in all respects, a changed man, and will not, I think, be an unworthy successor of him who is gone. His wife and children are all that can be desired.

"Farewell, my dear cousin. When you return to London come to the enclosed address, and see me. No one will welcome you more gladly than

"INEZ CATHERON."

So another large fortune had been left Edith—she was rich now beyond her wildest dreams. Rich! And yonder she lay, and all the gold of earth, powerless to add a second to her life. What a satire it seemed. Youth, beauty, and boundless wealth were hers, and all were vain—vain!

The seventh night brought the crisis.

"This can hold out no longer," the physician said; "before morning we will know the end, whether it is to be life or death."

"Then—there is hope yet?" Trix breathed, with clasped hands.

He looked at her gloomily and turned away, the meaningless formula on his lips:

"While there is life there is hope."

"It will be little less than a miracle if she lives, though," the other added; "and the days of miracles are over. Hope if you like—but—"

"You had better not let him sit up to-night," said the first physician, looking compassionately at Charley; "he won't be able to stand it. He is worn out now, poor fellow, and looks fit for a sick-bed himself."

"He knows it is the crisis," Trixy answered; "he won't go."

"He has watched the last two nights," Miss Seton interposed: "he must go, doctor; leave me an opiate—I will administer it. If—if the worst comes, it will be but a moment's work to arouse him."

The doctor obeyed.

"I will return at day dawn," he said, "if she be still alive. If not—send me word."

The twilight was falling. Solemn and shadowy it crept into the sombre, silent room. They went back to the bed-side, pale and tearless: they had wept, it seemed, until they could weep no more. This last night the two girls were to watch alone.

She lay before them. Dead and in her shroud she would never look more awfully death-like than now. He sat beside her—ah, for Charley! in a sort of dull stupor of misery, utterly worn out. The sharp pain seemed over—the long, dark watches, when his passionate prayers had ascended for that dear life, wild and rebellious it may be, when he had wrestled with an agony more bitter than death, had left their impress on his life forever. He could not let her go—he could not! O God!" was the ceaseless cry of his soul, "have mercy—spare!"

Nellie Seton's cool, soft hands fell lightly on his head. Nellie's soft, gentle voice spoke:

"Charley, you are to leave us for a little, and lie down. You must have some rest, be it ever so short; and you have had nothing to eat, I believe all day; you will let me prepare something, and take it, and go to your room."

She spoke to him coaxingly, almost as she might to a child. He lifted his eyes, full of dull, infinite misery, to hers.

"To-night?" he answered: "the last night! I will not go."

"Only for an hour then," she pleaded; "there will be no change. For my sake, Charley!"

All her goodness, all her patience came back to him. He pressed her hand in his own gratefully, and arose.

"For your sake, Nellie, then—for no other. But you promise to call me if there is the slightest change?"

"I promise. Drink this and go."

She gave him a glass of mulled wine, containing the opiate. He drank it and left the room. They listened breathlessly until they heard his door, further down the passage, open and shut—then both drew a deep breath.

"Thank Heaven," Trix said; "I couldn't bear to see him here to-night. Nellie, if she dies it will kill him—just that."

The girl's lips quivered. What Charley has been to her—how wholly her great, generous, loving heart had gone out to him, not even Trix ever knew. The dream of her life's best bliss was at an end forever. Whether Edith Stewart lived or died, no other woman would ever take her place in his heart.

The hours of the night wore on. Oh! those solemn night watches by the dying bed of those we love. The faint lamp flickers, deepest stillness reigns, and on his bed, dressed as he was, Charley lies deeply, dreamlessly asleep.

It was broad day when he awoke—the dawn of a cloudless November day. He sat up in bed suddenly, for a moment bewildered, and stared before him. Only for a moment—then he remembered all. The night has passed, the morning come. They had let him sleep—it seemed he could sleep while she lay dying so near. Dying! Who was to tell him that in yonder distant room Edith was not lying dead. He rose up, reeling like a drunken man, and made for the door. He opened it, and went out down the passage. It was entirely deserted, the great household were not yet astir. Profound stillness reigned. Through the windows he could see the bright morning sky, all flushd, red and golden with the first radiance of the rising sun. And in that room there what lay—death or life?

There was a little panting cry—then she covered her face with her hands and lay still.

"He is outside," went on Trix; "you don't know what a good boy he has been—so patient—and all that. He deserves some reward. I think if you had died he would have died too—Lord Lovel and Lord Nancy, over again. Not that I much believe in broken hearts where men are concerned, either," pursued Trix, growing cynical; "but this seems an exceptional case. He's awfully fond of you, Dithy; 'pon my word he is. I only hope Angus may go off in a dead faint the first time I'm sick and get better as he did the other day. We haven't let him in much lately, for fear of agitating you, but I think," says Trixy, with twinkling eyes, "you could stand it now—couldn't you, Mrs. Stuart?"

She did not wait for a reply—she went out and hunted up Charley. He was smoking downstairs, and trying to read the morning paper.

"Your wife wants you," said Miss Stuart brusquely; go! only mind this—don't stay too long, and don't talk too much."

He started to his feet—away went Tribune and cigar, and up the stairs sprang Charley—half a dozen at a time.

And then Miss Stuart sits down, throws her handkerchief over her face, and for the next five minutes indulges in the exclusively feminine luxury of a real good cry.

* * * * * *

After that Mrs. Charles Stuart's recovery was perfectly magical in its rapidity. Youth and splendid vitality, no doubt, had something to do with it, but I think the fact that she was Mrs. Charles Stewart had more to do still.

There came a day, when propped up with pillows, she could sit erect, and talk, and be talked to as much as she chose, when blinds were pulled up, and sunshine poured in; and no sunshine that ever shown was half so bright as her happy face. There came still another day, when robed in a pretty pink morning-dress, Charley lifted her in his arms and carried her to the arm chair by the window, whence she could look down on the bright, busy city street, whilst he sat at her feet and talked. Talked! who is to tell of what? "Two souls with but a single thought—two hearts that beat as one," generally find enough to say for themselves, I notice, and require the aid of no outsiders.

And there came still another day—a fortnight after, when, looking pale and sweet, in a dark gray travelling suit and hat, Mrs. Charles Stuart, leaning on her husband's arm, said good-by to her friends, and started on her bridal tour. They were to spend the next three weeks South, and then return for Trixy's wedding at Christmas.

Christmas came; merry Christmas, sparkling with snow and sunshine, as Christmas ever should sparkle, and bringing that gallant ex-officer of Scotch Grays, Captain Angus Hammond—captain no longer—plain Mr. Hammond, done with drilling and duty, and getting the route forever, going in for quiet, country life in bonnie Scotland, with Miss Beatrix Stuart for aider and abettor.

Charley and his wife came to New York for the wedding. They had told Mr. Hammond how ill Edith had been, but the young Scotchman, as he pulled his ginger whiskers and stared in her radiant, blooming face, found it difficult indeed to realize. She had been a pretty girl—a handsome woman—happiness had made her more—she was lovely now. For Charley—outwardly all his insouciance had returned—he submitted to be idolized and made much of by his wife, after the calm fashion of lordly man. But you had only to see him look once into her beautiful, laughing face, to know how passionately she was beloved.

Mr. and Mrs. Angus Hammond had a splendid wedding, and to say our Trixy looked charming would be doing her no sort of justice. And again Miss Seton was first bridesmaid, and Mrs. Stuart, in lavender silk, sniffed behind a fifty dollar pocket handkerchief, as in duty bound. They departed immediately after the ceremony for Scotland and a Continental tour—that very tour which, as you know, Trixy was cheated so cruelly out of three years before.

Mr. and Mrs. Stuart went back South to finish the winter and the honeymoon among the glades of Florida, and "do," as Charley said, "Love among the Roses." Mr. Darrell returned to Sandypoint. Mrs. Stuart, senior, took up her abode with Nellie Seton, pending such time as her children should get over the first delirium of matrimonial bliss and settle quietly down to housekeeping. After that it was fixed that she was to divide her time equally between them, six months with each. Charley and his wife would make England their home; Edith's ample fortune lay there and both loved the fair old land.

PARASOLS.

Great Variety Shown This Season in Materials, Decorations, and Design.

Parasols have acquired an extravagance in variety, expenditure, and quantity of material that is extremely tantalizing to the woman who would attempt to combine service and dressy qualities in one. For a thing which cannot vary much in shape, and can show variety only in materials and trimming, the parasol has developed wonderful possibilities of variation, but of course it must have a certain amount of newness of style to compete with the elaboration and expansion of the gowns and hats.

Chiffon and artificial flowers figure largely in its make-up. Chiffon para-sols are seen in all colors, puffed and frilled, until they bear some resemblance to a ballet girl's skirt. Lace insertions and points are effectively mixed up with the chiffon, and other chiffon parasols are decked out with flowers, regardless of the fact that the combination must open and shut. Ruffles of lace or chiffon, either plain or figured, in graduated widths, entirely cover some of the parasols, either put on straight or in points. The prettiest and most becoming are lined with pink and yellow. Elaborate linings are made of ruffles of thin silk edged with lace, which show beyond the edge. Many are not lined at all, but have gilt ribs. Less expensive parasols are of moire, chine, and pompadour silks in a great variety of colors. They are made plain or trimmed with lace ruffles and there is usually a large bow at the top a tached to the stick, which is usually of white wood.

Insertions of lace or chiffon puffings are a feature of the latest parasols and these are put in tword the edge, so as not to interfere with the purpose of protection, which is the excuse for its existence. Some of the chine parasols are lined with lace and a particularly novel idea is a triple flounce of pinked-out silk of some bright contrasting color, put on in points on the inside so as to fall below. Watered silks parasols with chine borders are very effective, and black ones with ecru lace and chine ribbon trimmings are another novelty. Black and white striped silks and black and white brocades, the latter trimmed with black lace, are among the serviceable parasols, and black satin trimmed with ruffles of white or black lace are stylish.

White parasols are the thing for summer with thin dresses, and they come in great variety. One of the prettiest styles is of plain white silk, with two rows of lace insertion set in a little above the edge, but perfectly plain ones are good style and quite inexpensive. The handles are of white enamelled wood. There is an endless variety in handles, gold and tortoise shell, with the monogram of diamonds and pearls, being the most expensive and quite the exception. Dresden china, agate, mother-of-pearl, coral, and ivory in the natural color are seen in large numbers among the sticks of natural wood.—N. Y. Sun.

THE MAN AND THE WOMAN.

Difficulties in the Way of Settling the Question at Issue.

The Pall Mall Budget comments on an article by Strindberg in the January number of The Revue Blanche called "The Inferiority of Women." It is a coincidence that The Spectator of the same week contains a review of a book by Eliza Burt Gamble entitled "The Evolution of Woman." These two facts, placed side by side, bring home to us at once the utter futility of the endles discussion on the relative positions of man and woman. The defense of men is undertaken by a man, the defense of women by a woman; they are both special pleaders, and as such can be no more than advocates; it is impossible for them to set themselves up as judges. Until some being, neither man nor woman, at once above yet in perfect sympathy with both, can be brought into court the question will ever remain an open one.

The fact is, it is impossible for us, constituted as we are, to measure things which do not contain a common unit. Man and woman differ not in degree but in kind. It is as absurd to claim that man as a whole is superior to woman as to claim the reverse. On what grounds can we go? Take that usually selected by the opponents—intellectual capacity. All men are not cleverer than all women. No one in his senses would assert it, and its opposite is not affirmed even by the most ardent "womanite." If we regard not the exceptions but the mass, what do we find? The ordinary man declares the woman to be devoid of business faculty, power of concentration and judgment; she retorts he is dull, lacking in imagination, unobservant. They are probably both right. But it is because their brains are differently constituted or because both are strong in the faculties which have been brought forward?

From his earliest school time, throughout his busines life, the boy and man has been forced to concentrate his attention, however, repugnant the process may be to him, or the penalty will be undendurable, he wil be left altogether behind in the race. And so with the other qualities. The ordinary woman, on the other hand, is bound to be observant, to get what pleasure she can out of trifles, to make her own interests, or her penalty will be excessive, the weariness of a life too dull to be borne. We are all familiar with the brilliant exceptions, the women who, without the advantages of the men, have outstripped them on their own ground. We wonder how M. Strindberg would deal with these; they are getting a little too numerous to be lightly thrust aside as "proving the rule." Besides these many of us have met women who never have done nor will do anything brillfant, but who are strong in the very qualities man claims for himself. Business-like, self-controlled, with admirable judgment, capable in every respect, even if they have lived with all their lives at home. The petulance which classes them in a mass with "negroes and children" shows something of the fretfulness of a "sick child" itself.

Until we can find our angelic visitant who is to tell us definitely once for all the truth of the matter, is it not wiser to cease quarrelling and allow each sex the fullest opportunity for developing what capabilities it has?—London Queen.

A Curious Fad.

The Count of Montesquieu, a wealthy and eccentric French nobleman, inhabits a splendid villa in the neighborhood of Paris, chiefly remarkable for its magnificent conservatory, which is used as a banqueting hall. Creeping among the plants in this winter garden are to be seen a number of little tortoises, which their eccentric owner has had enamelled and studded with precious stones.—Buntes Allerlei.

PERHAPS

Some day someone somewhere will make there what lay—death or life?

He stood suddenly still, and looked at the closed door. He stood there motionless, his eyes fixed upon it, unable to advance another step.

It opened abruptly—quickly but noiselessly, and Nellie Seton's pale, tired face looked out. At sight of him she came forward—he asked no questions—his eyes looked at her full of a dumb agony of questioning she never forgot.

"Charley!" she exclaimed, coming nearer.

The first ray of the rising sun streaming through the windows fell full upon her pale face, and it was as the face of an angel.

"Charley!" she repeated, with a great tearless sob, holding out both hands; "Oh, bless God! the doctor says we may—hope!"

He had braced himself to hear the worst—not this. He made one step forward and fell at her feet like a stone.

CHAPTER XXXII.

They might hope? The night had passed, the morning had come, and she still lived.

You would hardly have thought so to look at her as she lay, deadly white, deathly still. But as the day broke she had awakened from a long sleep, the most natural and refreshing she had known for weeks, and looked up into the pale anxious face of Trix with the faint shadow of a smile. Then the eyelids swayed and closed in sleep once more, but she had recognized Trix for the first time in days—the crisis was over and hope had come.

They would not let her see him. Only while she slept would they allow him now to enter her room. But it was easily borne—Edith was not to die, and Heaven and his own greatful happy heart only knew how infinitely blessed he was in that knowledge. After the long bitter night—after the darkness and the pain, light and morning had come. Edith would live—all was said in that.

"There are some remedies that are either kill or cure in their action," the old doctor said, giving Charley a facetious poke. "Your marriage was one of them, young man. I thought it was Kill—it turns out it was Cure."

For many days no memory of the past returned to her, her existence was as the existence of a new-born babe, spent alternately in taking food and sleep. Food she took with eager avidity after her long starvation, and then sank back again into profound, refreshing slumber.

"Let her sleep," said the doctor, with a complacent nod; "the more the better. It's Nature's way of repairing damages."

There came a day at last when thought and recollection began to struggle back—when she had strength to lie awake and think. More than once Trix caught the dark eyes in silent wistfulness upon her—a question in them her lips would not ask. But Miss Stuart guessed it, and one day spoke:

"What is it, Dithy?" she said; you look as if you wanted to say something, you know."

"How—how long have I been sick?" was Edith's question.

"Nearly five weeks, and an awful life you've led us, I can tell you! Look at me—worn to the skin and bone. What do you suppose you will have to say for yourself when Angus comes?"

Edith smiled faintly but her eyes still kept their wistful look.

"I suppose I was delirious part of the time, Trixy?"

"Stark, staring crazy—raving like a lunatic at full moon! But you needn't look so concerned about it—we've changed all that. You'll do now."

"Yes," she said it with a sigh; "you have all been very kind. I suppose it's only a fancy of the fever after all."

"What?"

"I—Trixy! don't laugh at me, but I thought Charley was here."

"Did you?" responded Trix; "the most natural thing in life. He is here."

Her eyes lighted—her lips parted—a question trembled upon them, but she hesitated.

"Go on," said Miss Stuart, enjoying it all; "there's something else on your mind. Speak up, Edie! don't be ashamed of yourself."

"I am afraid you will laugh this time, Trixy—I know it is only a dream, but I thought Charley and I were——"

"Yes," said Trixy! "were—what?"

"Married, then?" with a faint little laugh. "Don't tell him, please, but it seems—it seems so real, I had to tell you."

She turned her face away. And Trixy, with suspicious dimness in her eyes, stooped dawn and kissed that thin, wan face.

"You poor little Dithy!" she said; "you do like Charley, don't you! no, it's not a dream—you were married nearly a fortnight ago. The hope of my life is realized [illegible]

In May they sailed for England. They would spend the whole of the summer in Continental travelling—the pleasant rambling life suited them well. But they went down to Cheshire first; and one soft May afternoon stood side by side in the old Gothic church where the Catherons for generations had been buried. The mellow light came softly through the painted windows—up in the organ loft, a young girl sat playing to herself soft, sweet, solemn melodies. And both hearts bowed down in tender sadness as they stood before one tomb, the last erected within those walls, that of Sir Victor Catheron, Edith pulled her veil over her face—the only tears that had filled her eyes since her second wedding-day falling quietly now.

There were many remembrances of the dead man. A beautiful memorial window, a sombre hatchment, and a monument of snow-white marble. It was very simple—it represented only a broken shaft, and beneath in gold letters this inscription:

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF

SIR VICTOR CATHERON, of Catheron Royals, Bart

Died Oct. 3, 1867, in the 24th year of his age.

"His sun set while it was yet day."

THE END.

Screens for the House.

Tall frames with wire screens are coming more and more into use in households where there are small children. Placed around the stove or in front of a fire, they furnish special immunity against accidents, a frequent occurrence where great care is not taken. Around the baby's tub it protects him from draughts while getting a bath—around his crib it has many uses, a barrier against draughts, excessive sunlight and changing objects, etc. It can be utilized to form an enclosure making a small play-house for children from which they cannot escape nor be unreasonably disturbed. It can also be utilized for various other purposes not, however, germane to the uses for which it was originally intended, and which it would not be practicable to enumerate here.

"Eh? How? What for?"

"Why, a backward spring. See?"

Weak, Tired, Nervous

Women, who seem to be all worn out, will find in purified blood, made rich and healthy by Hood's Sarsaparilla, permanent relief and strength. The following is from a well known nurse:

"I have suffered for years with female complaints and kidney troubles and I have had a great deal of medical advice during that time, but have received little or no benefit. A friend advised me to take Hood's Sarsaparilla and I began to use it, together with Hood's Pills. I have realized more benefit from these medicines than from anything else I have ever taken. From my personal experience I believe Hood's Sarsaparilla to be a most complete blood purifier." MRS. C. CROMPTON, 71 Cumberland St., Toronto, Ontario.

He Deceived the People.

At Atlantic, Iowa, on May 7, C. M. Ailor, alias "Crip." Ailor, was convicted of deceiving the people by selling a worthless compound, which he represented to be Hood's Sarsaparilla, and was sentenced by Judge Macy to one year at hard labor in the Iowa State Penitentiary Ailor's methods were those of a travelling fakir. He has been travelling through Missouri, Nebraska and Iowa, making stands of a day or more in each town, and representing himself as an agent under salary of C. I. Hood & Co., and selling his concoction at $1 or 50 cents per bottle, giving with each sale various other worthless articles. Citizens of Griswold, Iowa, became suspicious and ascertaining from a druggist that Ailor's compound was not Hood's Sarsaparilla, but merely colored water, had him arrested. Three indictments were found against him, the jury convicted after only thirty minutes deliberation, and he was sentenced as above. This incident suggests the wisdom of purchasing medicines only of reputable dealers whom you know. Hood's Sarsaparilla is never sold by pedlers and such offering it should be reported at once to the authorities, or to C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Grave Yard Insurance.

Wm. Humphrey, formerly of Addington, where his wife and daughter still reside, went to live with his uncle, Dr. John Evans at Elmwood, in Bruce county, in 1884. On April 9th, following, a policy for $5000 was taken by Humphrey in the Excelsior, Dr. Evans, who paid the premium, being the beneficiary. The medical certificate testifying to the fact that Humphrey was a good risk was signed by Dr. Scott, Southampton. A short time subsequently a second policy for $3000 was taken out in the Mutual Reserve, the wife of Dr. Evans being the beneficiary. Dr. Evans signed the medical certificate as to the character of the risk. About the same time Humphrey joined the Chosen Friends, and a policy of $1500 was placed on his life, Wm. Evans, a brother of Dr. Evans, being the beneficiary. This made $6,500 in all on Humphrey's life. On Feb. 21st. Humphrey died and on March 1st claims were at once filed with the insurance companies for the amount of the policies. The insurance company became suspicious and on enquiry learned sufficient to warrant them in the conclusion that the insurance had been placed by Dr. Evans upon his uncle's life, as a speculation, knowing that Humphrey was afflicted with maladies which were incurable. They had the body exhumed and the examination established beyond a doubt that Humphrey had been a sufferer for years from many ailments, including dropsy, inflammatory rheumatism, diabetes, heart trouble. The companies interested have refused to pay the policies.

The first thunder storm of the season arrived on Saturday.

The Sovereign brought in a load of edgings for the Rathbun Co. on Tuesday.

Parish of Bath.

Rural Dean Baker and the Rev. F. D. Woodcock, exchange duty next Sunday, 19 inst. the former having been requested to visit the parish of Camden East officially to aid in renewing the Stipend subscription list for three years more. — Services in St John's church, D.V. as follows: 11 a.m. Litany, Holy Communion 7.30. Sermon and Offertory at 3 p.m; Evensong, sermon and offertory. Rev. Mr. Woodcock will preach at both Services his subject at night being "Protestantism, What is it?"

Parish of Camden.

Services Sunday next: 11 o'clock and 7 o'clock, at St. Luke's, Camden East; Holy Trinity, Yarker, 3 o'clock; Centreville, 3 o'clock; St John's, Newburgh, Holy Communion 8 o'clock; Evening prayer 7 o'clock. No service at Napanee Mills. The Rev. the Rural Dean has arranged, D. V., to visit this parish and preach on Sunday next at St. Luke's in the morning. Holy Trinity and St. John. It is hoped as many as possible will avail themselves of the opportunity of meeting and hearing him. There will be a concert in Hinch's Hall, Camden East on the Queen's birthday at 8 o'clock in aid of S. S. library.

Bath Easter Vestry Meeting.

The postponed Annual Easter Vestry meeting was held on Friday evening 10th May and was well attended. The Churchwarden's financial statement duly audited was approved. It showed that financially the parish never stood better the collections generally being in excess of those last year. The representatives in synod stand as before, viz: Dr. Northmore (re-elected) F. K. Baker, Dr. R. Kennedy. A resolution of thanks was unanimously given to the Bath Dramatic club for their valuable assistance during the winter, and another to Mr. F.R. Baker for his painstaking and very efficient services as vestry clerk. The improvements in the church proposed by the rector were discussed, and it being the Centennial year of the church a strong committee was appointed to see that they were carried out and to arrange for the holding of a monster demonstration to commemorate the opening of the church in the year 1795.

Rural Deanery.

The Whig thus refers to Mr. F. W. Ruttan's address at the meeting of the Rural Deanery, of Frontenac, held in Kingston last week:— "F. W. Ruttan, barrister of Napanee, made an excellent address to laymen, complaining of their want of stirring interest in the church, noting their conspicuous absence in numbers on that evening. The laymen were not making even a fair showing of doing their duty. He condemned the pew system and cited many instances of its utter selfishness. Churchmen break their vows every day, yet we never hear of a Mason or an Oddfellow doing it, showing that fidelity to God to whom we owe everything, was less distinguishable than faithfulness to an earthly institution. It requires more courage to stand up for Christ and His church than to march as a brave volunteer to the northwest or to Ridgeway, but the glory should be no greater. The continual struggle to obtain money to carry on churches was an evidence that men did not devote God's share to his service but used it in their worldly undertakings. It was an excellent address, for which Mr. Ruttan deserves the thanks of his brother laymen.

Napanee Mills En Fete.

The corner stone of the New Anglican church at Napanee Mills was laid with eclat, under Masonic auspices, yesterday afternoon, by most worshipful Grand Master R. T. Walkem. There was a large crowd in attendance, and the success of the ceremony is a bright augury for the future. The following members of the Order were present: Richard T. Walkem, Q. C., L. L. D., as Grand Master; Robert Longmore, as Deputy Grand Master; Mr. Ewart, as Grand Sen. Warden; Jas. Aylesworth, as Grand Jun. Warden; Rev. Arthur Jarvis, as Grand Chaplain; Mr. Richards, as Grand Treasurer; W. F. Gerow, as Grand Register; S. C. Warner, as Grand Secretary; Mr. McLaughlin, as Grand Sen. Deacon; Anson Aylesworth, as Grand Supt. of Works; Peter Johnston, as Grand Dir. of Ceremonies; Lewis Hartman, as asst. Grand Sec.; P. Phalen, as Asst. Grand Dir. Cer.; Mr. Wellbanks, as Grand Sword Bearer; Robt. Hope, as Grand Organist; Robert Henry, as Grand Pursuivant; M. I. Beeman, M. D., as Grand Steward; Cannif Shorey, as Grand Steward; Lewis Stover, as Grand Steward; Richard Wellbanks, as Grand Steward; Mr. Weese, as Grand Steward; Mr. Lockridge, as Grand Standard Bearer; Mr. Martin, as Grand Tyler; together with large numbers of the craft from Napanee, Bath, Centreville, Yarker, Newburgh, Camden East, Tamworth, Deseronto, Tyendinaga, Shannonville, Odessa, Harrowsmith, Kingston, Belleville, Picton, Wellington, Consecon, Milford, Bloomfield, Hillier, Ameliasburgh, Sophiasburgh, Hallowell, Demorestville, Rednersville, Roslin, Frankford, Trenton, Stirling, Madoc, Tweed, Marmora, Campbellford, Norwood, Peterboro, Lakefield, Bridgenorth, Lindsay, Omemee, Cobourg, Port Hope, Colborne, Brighton, Grafton, Castleton, Cramahe, Brighton, Alnwick

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

HAY BAY.

Well, Mr. Editor, being that your old correspondent has gone to Kingston to spend the 24th of May, and is not likely to return a single man, I think it would be a sin and a shame to allow the news of our city to not come in print.

Mr. Joseph Howie and Miss Rosa Brown have been visiting friends in Kingston for a few days.

Mr. Perry Brown and his sweet heart from town are also visiting friends in Kingston.

Mr. and Mrs. D. A. McCabe spent their 24th in Picton.

One man on front street has give way a thousand, a thousand what, fisherman; I guess these mighty hard times lets out lots of secrets. Pickerel are good eating.

Mr. and Mrs. Byard Young, of Napanee were the guests of Mr. M. E. Post last week.

TAMWORTH.

Miss Ella Goodwin has again resumed her position in the millinery department of her brothersin-law's, Mr. L. May's store.

Mr. John Parks, who has been laid up for some time, is able to be out again.

Mrs. Thos Miller and family have returned from Ottawa, where they spent the winter.

Mr. J. A. Floyd, jeweller, returned to Mattawawa on Wednesday last, having closed up his business here on account of the recent fire. He will open up his business again in that place. He is an enterprising yonng man and we wish him

Mr. Wm. Dougherty, our popular cheesemaker, was married at Bath on the 22nd, by the Rev. W. B. Tucker, to Miss Gertie Bennett, daughter of Robert Bennett of the Royal Hotel. We extend congratulations.

It is expected that the Free Methodist will shortly pitch their camp in Odessa.

By the breaking of a lamp chimney, which she was cleaning Mrs. Ed. Clarke inflicted a severe gash on her arm.

Dr. Metzler has been appointed choir leader of the Methodist church here.

The court of Revision held here on Monday was largely attended, and many assessments were lowered.

WILTON.

Mrs. Pultz who was taken suddenly ill last Friday is slightly improving.

Miss Gertrude Mills is also on the sick list. Her brother W. Mills is taking charge of her school at Thorpe until she is convalescent.

The 24th was a very quiet day in Wilton. A number went to Odessa to witness the baseball match between the Newburgh and Odessa teams.

Visitors:—Mrs. T. Johnston, Napanee, and Mrs. E. Joyce, Kingston, at Wm. Ovens'; Mordy Storms, Cole Lake, at R. Storms'; H. Warner, Napanee, at Mrs. Pultz's; Miss M. Emerson, Spaffordton, at H. Smelting Works for Napanee.

It would mean employment for a thousand men and an immediate increase in our population of at least five thousand. There are no vacant houses in Napanee to day and our mills and mechanics would be unable to furnish homes for such a rapid increase therefore outside mechanics and their families will at once flock to our town. The mechanics would also be compelled to increase their help and our town would boom as it never boomed before. Lots that are now vacant will easily bring two hundred dollars a foot, but the proposal of securing smelting works are not very good. We have however, a first-class paint works in our town and by patronizing home manufacture your money to a great extent remains in Napanee. Therefore buy Madden's pure, ready mixed paint. Remember our floor paints dry hard over night.

success in his undertaking.

The grounds around the new Methodist parsonage are being improved and when complete will add greatly to its appearance.

Chas. Shields has started to build on his old site again, and has his store up to the foundation ready for the brick.

C. G. Coxall has purchased the site of G. A. Floyd and will erect a brick store. He has the excavation ready and has given out the building by tender. The plans and specifications can be seen at W. Coxall's store, Napanee, or at Tamworth. Tenders are to be all in before June 1st. There is no other buildings going up except the town hall. Tenders are open for same, which will be brick, tenders to be in by the 27th inst. It will be a fine building.

Rheumatism Cured in a Day.—South American Rheumatic Cure, for Rheumatism and Neuralgia, radically cures in 1 to 3 days. Its action upon the system is remarkable and mysterious. It removes at once the cause and the disease immediately disappears. The first dose greatly benefits. 75 cents. Sold by W. S Detlor, Druggist.—46y.

PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY.

The recent heavy frosts did not do as much damage in this county as was at first supposed.

Hildebrand Valleau, High Shore, last week visited relatives and friends in Deseronto and Shannonville.

Saturday, June 8th, is the day chosen for the third annual picnic of the Patron's of Industry, at our far famed Sandbanks. Come one, come all, and enjoy a days outing at this charming resort.

The Citizen's Band will appear in a new uniform on June 8th. The new suits are to be made of a very dark navy blue serge trimmed with black braid and with black barrel-shaped buttons.

The sudden and untimely death of Dr. Fred Morden, of Demorestville, cast a gloom over the entire county. Dr. Morden was well known having taught school in several sections prior to his entering Queen's university from which he graduated last year. His age was only twenty-six years, but then, "How long we live, not years but actions tell," says the poet, and considering this we would come to the conclusion that he was old not according to the number of years that he has lived but according to the amount of good he has done his fellow men.

Tom Kinney, one of Prince Edward's popular young men, has lately accepted a lucrative situation in Rochester, N. Y. One more drop of Canada's life-blood gone to swelll the throbbing veins of Uncle Sam. As we watch our brightest and best young men turn their backs upon fair Canada and seek 'neath the stars and stripes that which, under the existing order of things, they are unable to secure in Canada, there is one consolatory thought comes to us viz. Uncle Sam is very appreciative and we see many of our young Canadians pushing their way to the formost ranks of commercial and political life in the land across the border.

Catarrh Relieved in 10 to 60 Minutes One short puff of the breath through the Blower, supplied with each bottle of Dr. Agnew's Catarrhal Powder, diffuses this Powder over the surface of the nasal passages. Painless and delightful to use, it relieves instantly, and permanently cures Catarrh, Hay Fever, Colds, Headache, Sore Throat, Tonsilitis and Deafness. 60 cents. Sold by W. S. Detlor.—46y.

ODESSA.

The Odessa baseball team defeated the Newburgh club by a score of 21 to 20. The game was hotly contested, the winning run being made by the Odessas in the ninth innings with only one man out. The batteries for Newburgh were, E. Shorey, Deroche, and E. Paul and Moore. For Odessa L. R. Cairns and F. Cairns.

The New Orleans Jubilee Singers gave an entertainment here on the 24th, in aid of the organ fund of the Methodist church. A nice sum was realized.

Mr. N. F. Snider's barn on the Wilton road, was destroyed by fire on the 24th, together with a quantity of hay and grain, waggons and machinery. Loss about $1,000. No insurance.

A fire set out in Mr. Derbyshire's bush on the 23rd done considerable damage, burning about 2,000 rails. It was extinguished by the rain on Sunday.

On Thursday last. Ascension day, at noon, what was intended to be a quiet wedding was celebrated in St. Alban's church by Rev. F. T. Dibb. A rumor of the event attracted quite a crowd to the church to witness the ceremony. It was the marriage of Jas. Bernard Milborn, of Richmond, and Miss Annie R. Gilchrist, of Morven. The groom was supported by Anson Parks, of Newburgh and the bridesmaid was Miss Sarah Brandon, of Violet. The bridal party left on a drive to Bath and other Bay of Quinte points.

prayer-meeting on Thursday night. We hope he may be returned to this mission after conference.

Mrs. Martin is at home again, having spent the winter in Milwaukee, Wis.

Mr. Sidney Grant is the happy father of another boy.

Mr. A. Parker is made doubly happy by the arrival of twins, a boy and girl.

Mr. McKeown is again seriously ill.

The infant child of Mr. J. Laveck died this morning.

The river-drivers are making their annual visit here.

Quite a number of people from here attended the Quarterly services in the Free Methodist church, Verona, which began on Thursday night and closed on Sunday.

Visitors—Mr. and Mrs. Hanor York, at Stewart Percy's, Mrs. Taylor and Mr. Chamberlain of Norwood, at Mr. Geo. Moir's.

CENTREVILLE WEST.

A couple of weeks ago the weather was very hot from 90 to 92 degrees in the shade, grass and vegetation grew rapidly, then it suddenly turned colder and there were heavy frosts, which did much damage, however, the rain on Sunday evening did much benefit to grass meadows.

A poor fruit season is now predicted. Planting is about completed.

Roadwork will soon commence, that is what little is left, after shoveling snow last winter.

There was a good deal of sour milk sent back from the factory on Monday morning.

Jas. Dowling purchased a number of cattle last week in the rear townships to stock his farm.

Washing sheep is now a thing of the past.

Tramps are numerous. Some of them are musicians.

A base-ball club will soon be formed here. We have the material here to begin with.

The hops are doing splendid.

E. H. Perry is having his verandah repaired. He and his brother, Dan, of Violet, have been visiting friends at Cloyne.

Some of our young men make frequent trips to "California." Remember boys, When a Miss is wed no word is said

Mr. and Mrs. Franklin, of Gananoque, have moved in with their son, James Franklin.

We have had quite heavy frosts lately. The cold weather and lack of rain has kept the crops quite backward in this vicinity. But on Sunday evening we had a very fine shower.

Quite a number of our young people attended the Queen's birthday celebration in Kingston and report a good time.

A new barn recently erected by W. Doyle, of Ernestown Station was destroyed by the fire fiend on the evening of the twenty-fourth. Some of his farming implements were burned. The fire was thought to be, and was no doubt, the work of tramps. It was a heavy loss as the barn was only insured for $500.

Mrs. Barrie has removed to Bath where she will rent a house in the future. Our village was quite crowded with visitors on Sunday. Mr. and Mrs. Topliff, from Bath, at Mr. S. Smith's; Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Clement at his fathers; and Miss Ried and Mr. and Mrs. Lee, from Kingston, at Mrs. J. Fleming's.

A lecture is to be delivered in Beulah church on Thursday next in place of the regular meeting of the Epworth League. Speakers: Rev. H. I. Allen, Rev. W. B. Tucker and others.

Mrs. Barrett has been very ill but is recovering.

Mrs. Arnie Milligan has returned home after spending a week with friends in Sydenham.

THE THIEF DODGED.

The Story is as Old as the Hills, But When It's Neatly Told It's Always Good.

Colored people are very superstitious, and not more in anything than in religion. A little yellow barber in a congregation not a thousand miles back of Covington recently lost (?) a favorite razor and applied to his pastor to make an effort to regain it for him. All efforts failed, however, until one Sunday the good man announced from the pulpit that he wanted a large turning out of believers on the following Sunday for he was going to point out the man that stole the good brother's razor.

The little church was crowded to suffocation on the following Sunday, and everbody waited with breathless anticipation for the arrival of the prophet. After a long wait a column opened in the middle aisle and the preacher approached the reading desk bearing in each hand a huge bowlder. Scanning the congregation narrowly for a few moments with an accusing eye, he clapped the bowlders down on the reading desk with a bang that made every chicken and razor thief in the congregation jump. After a powerful silence and another searching glance he began:

"Brudders, I feels to-day like David as he went out to meet that giant Goliath, and, brudders, I 'pears before you to-day in the role of the same David. Brudders and sisters, they's a Goliath among us here to-day; he's been pestern our coops and he's been pickin' our pockets, and he's here with us to-day. He knows he stole Brudder Robinson's chickens last week; he knows he stole Brudder Johnson's razor, but he comes here to-day thinking the good Lord don't have no power over sinners.

"Brudders an' sisters, I'm going to take this rock and throw it, and hit the nigger that stole that razor; and, brudders an' sisters, when I says nigger I speaks advisedly. When I throws this rock they needn't none of you dodge saven the nigger that stole that razor, and the rock'll be buried in his forehead as it was on that day long ago buried in the forehead of that other sinner Goliath.

"Now, brudders an' sisters, I'm goin' to throw, and don't nobody dodge but the nigger that stole that razor. Look out, there, nigger—one, two, three!"

Everybody remained erect with conscious guiltlessness but one race track nigger over in the corner, who dropped under the seat as the preacher pronounced "three."

"There he is, Brudder Johnson, there he is!" the prophet yelled at the top of his voice as the head disappeared; "there's the nigger that stole your razor!"—Cincinnati Tribune.

EXPRESS-IONS

ON CURRENT ITEMS OF LOCAL INTEREST.

A couple of weeks ago we alluded to the practice of bicyclists riding on the sidewalk. A number have unheeded the warning, and complaints from pedestrians are numerous. At this season of the year there is no excuse for riding on the sidewalk, and the wheelmen that persist in doing it are unwise in their generation. Just as soon as people begin to dread danger from the silent steed so soon will the most irksome by-laws and restrictions confront the bicyclist.

The local devotes of Canada's national game have got a bad attack of lacrosse fever, and the agitation to start a club here this season will undoubtedly meet with success. The boys met at the palace grounds on Wednesday evening and had a practice match, and the club will no doubt date from this occasion. Anything bearing the least semblance to a lacrosse stick was improvised for the time being, and everything indicates that lacrosse has struck town to stay. Napanee had a lacrosse team a few years ago that was second to none in the district. Many of the old time players are taking an active part in the movement to organize a club here, and any one desirous of joining are requested to hand in their names to Mr. J. F. McAlister, one of the "old timers," who has shared in many a well fought contest in the days when

As the doctor spoke, the man who but a few moments before had been struck by a cable car and who was now lying prostrate in the rear room of the corner drug store, moved uneasily and slowly opened his eyes and looked wonderingly around him on the faces of the men who had carried him away from the path of death.

"Am I hurt?" he queried vaguely, as he made an effort to move and then sank back again, his face pale from the unusual pain.

"Yes," said the doctor. "Don't you remember you were trying to cross the street and did not see the car behind you? It's a wonder that you were not killed. We were going to take you direct to the hospital, but I thought when you came to you might wish to go home. I think you can be moved now."

A look of great anxiety came over the injured man's face.

"What time is it?" he asked.

The doctor consulted his watch. "It is now," he said, "just a quarter past 5."

"Would it be any harm," said the sufferer, with an expression of deep earnestness, "if I stayed here for an hour or so yet? I don't want to go home just now."

"But you would be much better cared for there," replied the medical man, "and I don't see any reason why you should want to stay here. Come, what difference does it make whether you get home now or an hour from now?"

"It makes a great difference," exclaimed the man on the couch, with a look of intense anguish. "You may not know it, sir," he went on, his voice rising with the excitement, as he clutched the physician by the arm and winced visibly at the thought of what might be his fate, "but my wife is giving an afternoon tea, and I thought I would rather wait until it is over with."—Life.

The question of providing for our unfortunate poor in a suitable manner is one that will not down. Sending them to gaol to herd with criminals, because they are aged and infirm is inhuman and unchristian. While there is much to commend the plan of County Poor Houses it does not meet the case fully. While some Counties adopt this plan, others like Lennox & Addington, evade it. They are called upon, however, to contribute to the counties who do erect Poor Houses, because our local government makes yearly grants to these institutions. By far the better plan would be for the Provincial Government to take the care of making provision for these unfortunates, and then no community could shirk its responsibility in the matter.

THE BRAVERY OF DESPERATION.

The Tory spring-chicken hath crowed and all the hens are cackling. Mr. Northrup, M. P., has delivered himself and is getting in form for his 12th of July oration when he will explain to the Orangemen of Hastings the attitude of the Government on the Manitoba School question. Mr. Northrup appears to be the only Tory in the lines who is ready to take his medicine cheerfully. Its a magnificent exhibition of bravery to witness a young man stand up for a principle and a policy that is now almost universally recognized as the cause of all our distress, yet it is pitiful too to be forced to admit that men of ability are willing to sacrifice their neighbors and their country for the sake of power. The N. P. is the cherished idol of the manufacturers and the manufacturers lay the golden eggs for the Tories at election time. That is the sum and substance of Tory patriotism and Tory philosophy. The one and only great question that agitate the Tory mind is "how can we remain in power?" Let the country go to the dogs but let us remain in power! What care they for the farmer and the mechanic? They draw their salaries and revel in the sweets of office. That is their only care, their only ambition. No one knows this better than Mr. Northrup. It is absurd and reckless to speak of the National Policy in the county of Hastings? Where are the thriving industries that were to spring up in Belleville? Where are all the foundries, smelting works and factories that the N. P. was to create? If Mr. Northrup knows anything of his own county he knows that first-class farms within a few miles of Belleville can be bought today for 50, 60 and 70 per cent. of what they sold for fifteen years ago. If Mr. Northrup knows anything of his own city he knows that real estate has decreased in value, that rents have been reduced, that the number of the unemployed is on the increase and business failures have multiplied during the past fifteen years. In the face of this Mr. Northrup has the bravery to stand up and speak in glowing terms of the great benefits of the N. P. It is a brave act indeed—but a bravery born in desperation. The Tories see the ground slipping from under their feet and their only hope rests in the boodle bags of the manufacturers.

Paine's Celery Compound Saves a Well-Known Norfolk County Farmer.

Completely Cured After Four of the Best Doctors had Failed.

Few men in Norfolk County, Ontario, are better or more favorably known than Mr. Joseph Rolston, of Nixon. This gentleman, some time ago, was in such an extremely alarming condition of health, that relatives and friends were fearful of results. Four skilled physicians did all for the sick man that could be done, but a cure was beyond their best efforts. Providentially, Mr. Rolston was intduced to give Paine's Celery Compound a trial, with the result that sickness and disease were banished, and a valuable life saved to the community. Mr. Rolston, who writes for the benefit of suffering men and women, has his statements vouched for by two well-known Methodist ministers, Rev. T. R. Clark, of Delhi, and Rev. D. Williams, of Nixon.

Mr. Rolston says:—

"It gives me great pleasure to add my testimony to the ever increasing popularity of your preparation known as Paine's Celery Compound. It is now a year past since I had a severe attack of nervous prostration caused by chronic dyspepsia, and for a year I could not sleep at night. This condition of sleeplessness brought on delirium. I was attended by four of the best doctors in the country, and took a great quantity of medicine, but all failed to do me any good. Having been persuaded to read your books I thought I would try your Paine's Celery Compound; and after I had used four bottles the nervousness and dyspepsia left me, and I have done more work since than for years past. I now enjoy excellent health and consider myself completely cured. I have highly recommend your Paine's Celery Compound to others, and I know of several persons who are now using it."

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, MAY 31, 1895.

There is a reason for everything and the reason that induced D. J Waggoner, of Frontenac county, to desert the Patrons of Industry has just been made apparent. Mr. Waggoner received during the past two years $3,131.82 from the Dominion Government as emigrant agent in the United States. In 1893 he received $2,272.39 for similar services. Last year, while he was a member of the Patrons, he only received $859.43. Now that he is back again to the Tory fold, it will no doubt go up to the old figure.

The Auditor General's Report is an interesting book. It shows, if you read it closely, how petty stealing is indulged in. The Civil Service dudes at Ottawa, who are reported to get tired laying down, ring in such items as this on the country, "Wear and tear of coat and suit, Sept. 16th, to Oct. 2nd, $6." Another charges his barber's bill, $1.30. Another charges his newspapers, $3.05. Another, "fur coat, 26 days, at 50 cents $13; umbrella, $5.55." An exchange says that it is a wonder these pets of fortune do not charge the country for the labor of drawing their breath.

A few weeks ago THE EXPRESS published an item from the Auditor General's Report for the year ending 30th of June, 1894, showing the revenue collected by E. H. Sills, fishery overseer for this district. Mr. Sills' return gives the names of a number of licencees and the amount paid by them, but licenses to the amount of $109.40 were collected in which the names of those taking them out are not given. They are bunched together after the following fashion, 3 at $10, 5 at $5, etc. A number of our subscribers have called, and are at a loss to know why all the names of those taking out licenses were not given. If it is right to give the names of some of them, it is surely right to give the names of all those who contributed to the revenue by taking out a fishing license. If this were done it could be easily ascertained if the overseer neglected to make a return of all the money collected by him. In looking over the Report we notice that this rule of bunching the licenses together and omitting to give the names of the licencees has been followed by quite a number of the overseers, and we are inclined to believe that the Auditor General may be responsible for the curtailment. No doubt Mr. Sills can give a satisfactory explanation, and as a great many are anxious that he should do so, we will gladly give him space in our columns for a full return.

TRICKED OUT OF THEIR RIGHTS.

In the last revision of the voters' list under the Dominion Franchise Act the Tories were allowed to work their own sweet will in this county, and the way the lists were manipulated is not very creditable to Uriah Wilson, M. P., or the Tory pushers in this constituency. All sorts of trifling objections wore made to deprive reputable citizens of the Franchise, and the following experience of a Napanee man is but the experience of many in this riding:

Mr. S. J. Borland, a gentleman of [illegible] in and ever since a res[illegible] the owner of con[illegible] on two occa[illegible] h when vot[illegible] was not in January [illegible] notified that an ap[illegible] been made to strike him off the voters' list on the same account. He was served with a subpœna to attend the court for the revision of the voters' list to be held at one o'clock rented for $100 per year. These are by no means isolated cases. At this ratio it would take the yearly rental of 4,000 acres to pay for Mr. Cockburn's little jaunt at Chicago. Is there an honest days wage for an honest days work. How many men in Lennox & Addington are raising, clothing and educating a family on $20 a month. When you come to think of these things it will perhaps strike you forcibly that our Commissioner to the World's Fair must have fared pretty well on $20 a day for board, for this does not include wines and cigars, nor extra meals. It is perhaps unkind of him in the face of it to tell us that he was on such short allowance that he was forced to spend $3,000 of his own money, presumably to keep soul and body together. When you think of the farmers of this district, during the past winter, drawing wood 16 and 17 miles to market for a $1.50 to $1.75 a cord, or the poor fellows who were glad to get a job, last winter, cutting tough hemlock wood at 25 cents a cord, you will be forced to admit that any one of them would be more profitably employed blacking the boots of our Commissioner Cockburn.

Mr. Cockburn is a fair representative of the class that represent the Tory party Parliament. They are not in touch with the masses; they are purely representative of the classes, and their one object in life seems to be to promote the interest of the few as against the many. They affect to see no depression among our farmers; they ignore their demands; by taxing the farmers they attempt to build up mushroom industries in defiance to all the laws that govern political economy and to the direct injury of agriculture. Mr. Cockburn may be representative of Toronto, but he was a poor man to choose as the representative of Canada at the World's Fair. If Mr. Cockburn must have wine, and other etceteras, it is all right for him to take them, but when he asks the people of Canada to pay for them, it is quite a different thing. We believe there should be a vote of the House taken on these expenditures of Mr. Cockburn's. It would show at least which of the members were favorable, and those adverse to this kind of business.

Selecting a Bicycle.

Next to the watch there is nothing that has to be taken on trust more than a bicycle. Like a cheap watch a cheap wheel can be made to imitate a first-class article, so that only an expert can tell which is which. The mischief of it is that whereas the average man is willing to admit that he doesn't know all about a watch simply by looknig at the case, and is content to take the dealer's advice, the man who buys a bicycle generally had a firm conviction that he knows it all.

In nine times out of ten when we hear of a man who has taken up wheeling only to drop it again like a bar of hot iron, we can be certain that he has bought a wheel that was too big or too little, or too something or other that it ought not to have been. Had he consulted a friend and also a reliable dealer and selected a wheel, as he would a house to live in, he would not have become discouraged in the first month and renounced bicycling forever. To be sure, some dealers sell bicycles as they would potatoes, but intelligent dealers can be found and are worth looking for. Let

HYGIENIC CYCLING.

When You Go Wheeling Never Wear Close-Fitting Stays—A Physician's Suggestions.

A Philadelphia physician offers the following counsel of women who will a-wheeling go.

"Every other woman one meets," he says, "owns or is saving for the purchase of a safety, exercise on which there is none better to be found. The wheel takes its rider into the open air, where American women can scarcely spend too much time and any one will notice, to their honor, how erect these petticoated cyclists sit in their saddles, a direct reproach to their hump-shouldered brethern. But there is another side to this picture. It is beginners particularly who are tempted to forget the virtue of taking things easy and in their excited interest make the first mistakes.

"No woman, however strong or eager to learn, should take a cycle lesson over a half hour long, and she should stop frequently in her course of it to rest and pull some long breaths. The girl who is not very strong and the least bit uncertain as to the cause of her weakness will be the happier and better for asking a physician's advice before putting her foot to the pedal. In ninety-nine case out of a hundred he will send her at once to the cycle school.

"It is the anemic, weak-lunged, narrow-chested, dyspeptic woman whom the bicycle is a very tonic, but she, if having no directions from a doctor, must follow common sense in her practice, and if in the first lesson of a half hour seems to have exhausted her strength, should cut it in half, taking 15 minutes twice in one day and a cracker and a few spoonfuls of sherry when the exercise is over. If possible learn to ride in one of the good cycle schools where one learns in half the usual time and the instructor shows a would-be wheelwoman how to use her strength on the pedals so as to save her the muscular effort a poorly taught person puts forth.

"A great deal has been said as to what constitutes the dress graceful and convenient for cycling, but little as to the dress healthful. Now, whether a woman chooses to wear trousers, a short skirt or a long one, let her be sure not to have her stays tight, and if she is slendor and can afford the extra expenditure, use a buttoned corded waist or a pair of short riding corsets in place of the long, heavily boned stays of daily use. There is no gain of grace or beauty in a small waist for bicycling, but much danger to heart and digestion from a tightly-laced body when wheeling. A woman who rides much in summer ought to wear with her lose stays the thinnest of wool undervests, which absorbs the moisture of the body, prevents one from taking cold and is the coolest, lightest garment for wear under a percale skirt waist.

"Never when wheeling garter your stockings with elastic bands above the knee. Use long elastic hose supporters, fastened to the bottom of the corset, and strap under your saddle, when setting out for anything like a lengthy ride, a little case, holding a vial of brandy, a skein of black sewing silk, a needle, a wee pair of scissors, a square of court plaster and a small bottle of ammonia.

"Never get on your wheel until a half hour after eating, and never wheel steadily for more than 30 minutes at a time. Slacken speed and roll along slowly for a bit before resuming a smart pace. Two hours is the longest regular daily exercise even a strong woman should take on her safety, and she who cycles by a doctor's orders may take an hour every other day, preferably in the morning, and a half hour after breakfast for steady exercise, drinking a little milk and eating a biscuit when the work is over."

court had been held at a much earlier hour in the day, and that his name had been struck off the list. We understand this and similar tricks are depriving many of their right to vote at the Dominion election, and persons so deprived should see that they are not so defrauded.

Mr. Borland appealed to the Judge, and succeeded in getting his name on the list. A similar trick, we understand, was played in Roblin on a qualified voter there. We would consider it a favor if the Reformers and Patrons in this riding would take the trouble to ascertain if their names are on the voters' list, and if not to report the fact to THE EXPRESS office.

COMMISSIONERS SO HIGH AND FARMS SO LOW.

There is nothing small about the average Tory politician, and when he goes out on a jaunt at the people's expense he follows Sir Charles Tupper's advice and "claps on all sail" with a vengance. G. R. R. Cockburn, Tory member of Parliament for Toronto Centre, while acting as Dominion Commissioner at the Chicago World's Fair was evidently filled with a desire to impress upon the "blawsted" Yankee that the position of Dominion Commissioner was not only an important, but a pleasant one. His expenses while there representing Canada cost us $4,425. Mr. Cockburn believed in doing the thing up right. He has $957 charged to the country for cabs, railway fares, posterage, entrees, cigars, etc. His board bill at the Virginia hotel amounted to $20 per day. Then there is such additional items as $40 for wines and extra meals ; $3.10 for blacking shoes for a week ; $11 for livery ; $9.75 for theatre tickets ; $3.50 for flowers ; $6 for seven days laundry. In one week's account was $1.20 for pressing his hat, and a member in the House of Commons pointed out that Mr. Cockburn's wine bill had been specially large that week, and wondered whether there was any connection between the two charges. In the face of these expenditures Mr. Cockburn had the audacity to inform the House that this was not sufficient for his wants and that he was called upon to expend $3,000 of his own money. If this is so it demonstrates that he is too rich for the blood of the people of Canada.

When such men as Mr. Cockburn are at the head of affairs in Canada is it any wonder that we have deficits, and that the people are crying hard times. They take a large view of affairs do those gentlemen. They tell us the country is prosperous ; the people are happy and contented ; the purchasing power of a dollar has largely increased; we have a fine home market ; lots of manufacturing industries ; an honest days days wage for an honest days work'; no exodus ; and then they send Mr. Foster over to England, where the people are so depressed and poor from the effects of free trade, to borrow more money to expend on such undertakings as the Curran bridge, the Sheiks Island dam, the Little Rapids locks, and as a general wind up they waste a half a million dollars on Mr. Haggart's ditch, called out of courtesy the Tay canal, to extend the "prosperity" to their needy friends.

We believe the people of Canada are awakening to the fact that they are being plundered by a lot of sharks, who are simply in Parliament for their own aggrandizement. The Cockburn incident is only a small matter, but these small matters taken in the aggregate amount to many thousands of dollars, and as it is only one of the many it serves as an example.

There is a farm in this district that in 1878 was sold for $9,000. It is rented at present for $150 a year. There is a farm over near Selby, carrying a mortgage of $3,000, that is you will be satisfied and suited without going through a round of costly experiments. You don't wear clothes that don't fit you—then why a bicycle?—Exchange.

To Avoid Accidents.

If you are a pedestrian and uncertain which way a wheelman is going stand still. He can get out of your way more quickly and surely than you can his.

If you are riding a wheel and see a pedestrian uncertain which way he will move, stop short; for he is likely to jump in front of your wheel when it is too late to avoid him.

Indeed, nearly all accidents in the shape of collisions with pedestrians are from one of these two causes.

A New Cycle.

Last week a number of Toronto people were surprised by the appearance on our streets of what appeared a single bicycle with two riders. It was a double machine, but the riders, instead of sitting one behind the other in tandem style, sat beside one another, much in the same way as on the old sociable tricycle. The machine is the invention of a Mr. Weaver of Hamilton, who had it in Toronto last week exhibiting it to the manufacturers with the purpose of selling the patent. Our illustration will enable the reader to readily understand the construction of the machine, though many cannot understand how two riders of unequal weight will be able to manage it. The weight of the riders does not appear to make any material difference, and, in fact, Mr. Will Hyslop rode the wheel alone. The only particular advantage we see in it is that the riders can more easily carry on conversation, but against this are the disadvantages of greater space required for passing other vehicles and the much wider circle cut in turning round.—Cycling.

horses. Mr. Miller says the tricycles work finely. He expects to have them here soon. Mr. Miller's contract runs for three years. This is the only stage line in the United States which will be run by steam tricycles, and the experiment will be watched with interest all over the country. They will have room for passengers and mail and will have a speed of from three to twelve miles per hour. The route these machines will be placed on will give them a thorough test, as there is a great deal of mountain road to travel.—San Francisco Examiner.

Perfect Unicycle at Last.

Promises galore have been made from time to time that some great man would shortly introduce a cycle that would revolutionize the world in point of speed ; these have never been kept and the people in general, cyclers in particular, have learned to view with an eye of distrust any such statement.

But at last a unicycle has appeared which has been put to the crucial test, and although it is not as yet perfect, it has one thing in its favor, i. e., it has been ridden, and speedily and safely as well.

The machine emanated in the brain of E. N. Highly of Somersworth, N. H., who shared the genius of most inventors, inasmuch as "the idea popped into his head." To a man up a tree "the idea" looks as if it were a good one.

The machine in its crude state is 7 feet 3 inches high, and weighs 54 pounds. Alminium enters largely into its composition ; this metal if fortified by the introduction of a few hickory spokes and whatever steel is requisite for sprocket, wheels, chain and cranks. The rider sits in a circle 42 inches in diameter ; tangent spokes radiate from the boundaries of this inner circle to the exterior aluminium rim, which is shod with pneumatic tires.

Facing the saddle is a pair of common handle bars by which the unique vehicle is guided. The motive power is supplied by a series of chain gears attached to friction pulleys which revolve in the inner circle. A peculiar feature of the apparatus is the fact that by removing the saddle, which can be readily done, it practically disables the machine, and thus prevents usuage or possible theft by others.

If she Only Knows.

"Are you satisfied," urged the philanthropist, "to have one-half of the world not know how the other half lives ?"

"That depends," rejoined the woman, calmly, "on which half I am in."

Of course if her curiosity were to be baffled, she had rather she were dead.—Detroit Tribune.

New Ailments.

'Strange, ain't it, the new kinds of ailments folks has?" remarked Mr. Simri Smith, after reading his newspaper.

"Now I've been a-reading an advertisement in here of a new medicine, and it says it's dreadful good for a sluggish liver."

"Liver trouble ain't no new disease, pa," responded Mrs. Smith. "I remember grandfather having liver trouble when I wasn't more'n 10 year old."

"I was a-saying that this medicine was good for sluggish liver, Martha Ann, and what beats me is how them slugs gets inside the liver, anyhow."

Ready for Him.

Some time ago an amorous young man sent a letter to a German lady and this postcript was added :

"That my darling may make no mistake, remember that I will wear a light pair of trousers and a dark, cutaway coat. In my right hand I will carry a small cane and in my left a cigar.—Yours ever, Adolphe."

The father replied courteously, stating that his daughter had given him authority to represent her at the appointed place at the time agreed on. His postscript was as follows :

"Dot mine son may make no mishdakes, I will be dreshed in mine shirt sleeves; I will vear in mine right hand a glub ; in mine left hand I will vear a six-shooter. You will recognize me by de vay I bats you on de head a goople of times twice mit de glub. Vait for me at de corner, as I have somedings important to inform you mit.—Your frent, Heinrich Muller."

—The work of excavating a ship canal of twenty feet in depth through the waters of the great lakes between Chicago, Duluth and Buffalo, which was begun in 1893, is now more than two-thirds completed. The work is divided into eight sections. The first four sections include the excavation needed in the Saulte St. Marie River, through which there will be a channel twenty-one feet in width. The remaining four sections will complete the channel from the foot of Lake Huron to deep water at the head of Lake Erie.

—The proposed overland route from America to Europe, via the Trans-Siberian Railway, is one of the biggest enterprises of the century, and is progressing at such a rapid rate that the Russian Government is looking forward to its completion in 1901. The western and central portions, reaching down to Irkutsk at the foot of the Baikal, and the extreme eastern portion from Vladivostock are to be ready for use between 1896 and 1898, and the Government is pushing on with the Baikal connections, so as to get them finished by the same date, if possible.

THE TRIUMPH OF LOVE

IS HAPPY, FRUITFUL MARRIAGE.

Every Man Who Would Know the Grand Truths: the Plain Facts; the New Discoveries of Medical Science, as applied to Married Life; Who Would Atone for Past Errors and Avoid Future Pitfalls, Should Secure the Wonderful Little Book Called "COMPLETE MANHOOD and How to Attain it.

"Here at last is information from a high medical source that must work wonders with this generation of men."

The book fully describes a method by which to attain full vigor and manly power.

A method by which to end all unnatural drains on the system.

To cure nervousness, lack of self control, despondenc , etc.

To exchange a jaded and worn nature for one of brightness, buoyancy and power.

To cure forever effects of excessess, overwork, worry etc.

To give full strength, developement and tone to every portion and org anof the body.

Age no barrier. Failure impossible. 2,000 references.

The book is purely medical and scientific, useless to curiosity seekers, invaluable to men only who need it.

A despairing man, who applied to us soon after wrote:

"Well, I tell you that first day is one I'll never forget. I just bubbled with joy. I wanted to hug everybody and tell them my old self had died yesterday and my new self was born to-day. Why didn't you tell me when I first wrote that I would find it this way?"

And another thus:

"If you dumped a cartload of gold at my feet it would not bring such gladness into my life as your method has done."

Write to the ERIE MEDICAL COMPANY, Buffalo N. Y., and ask for the little book called "COMPLETE MANHOOD." Refer to this paper, and the company promises to send the book, in sealed envelope, without any marks, and entirely free, until it is well introduced.

His Feelings Were Hurt.

A well-known city bicyclist, who has had some years' experience in riding, happened into Bailey's, the Wellington street machinist yesterday. There were a number of bicycles there waiting for repairs. On one of them the front forks were twisted queerly.

"More work of some of the greenies, I suppose," observed the expert to a meek looking man who was also inspecting the damage curiously.

"But they can fix things like that, can't they?" remarked the meek looking man.

"Oh, of course; still there's no sense in having 'em," said the expert, "there's the blankest lot of blanked idiots starting to ride wheels this year I ever saw."

"Perhaps bicycles are not as good as they used to be," said the meek looking man.

"They're a darned sight better," said the expert, "its only the fault of the blooming chumps that ride them. Now how in thunder did the crazy man that owns this wheel manage to bend these front forks that way, I wonder?"

"I don't hardly know," replied the meek looking man. "I had quite a hard fall—that is my wheel."

As the expert disappeared in a cloud of dust the meek looking man observed to a third party that the fall had not injured him, but that his feeling were a little hurt.—Ottawa Journal.

...CTORAL,

RAINFORTH'S STRANGE CASE.

BY WILL LISENBEE.

My name is Hiram Dixon. I am a man past the prime of life and more given to the pursuit of studies that pertain to my profession than dealing in romances, yet I feel that I may be pardoned if in my declining years, when one begins to feel the languor of the autumn of life, I turn for a brief diversion from the dry catalogue of science to a period of my existence which is marked by incidents so strange and romantic as to challenge belief.

By profession I am a physician and surgeon a plain, practical man, who has found little time to indulge in idle speculations over the marvelous or cultivate a desire to penetrate the veil behind which are hidden strange forces which have for thousands of years puzzled the learned and unlearned of every land. So I shall only record the incidents of my story just as they happened, without any attempt to solve what may to some seem mysterious or reconcile such to the measurement of the rule and line of ordinary practical experience.

I am a childless widower, and aside from what my professional duties entail I mingle but little with the outside world. For more than 20 years I have followed my profession in Mayburg, and I may add that although my income is not what some who are more ambitious might call large I find it sufficient for all my needs.

It was just five years ago that I first met Gerald Rainsford. He was not over 25 at that time and possessed of all the enthusiasm of one who is ambitious and has set out to accomplish something in life, yet he was moody at times and would act and talk in the most strange and eccentric manner. Being a painter of more than ordinary skill, he had come to Mayburg to sketch the picturesque scenery to be found in that vicinity. He was rich—so rumor said and could well afford to indulge his taste for art in whatever struck his fancy or brought apparel, an opera glass, two French novels and a small black glass jar containing a colorless liquid, which proved to be alcohol. Upon his person was found a costly gold watch and a red morocco pocketbook containing some $200, mostly in small bills. It was evident that whatever the motive of the murderer had been it had not been robbery. But who had committed the deed? That was the question that was in everybody's mouth, yet none could offer even a shadow of a solution to the problem.

An ugly knife wound in the region of the victim's heart told that the murderer had done his work quickly and well. A farmer of the name of Marks had been the first to discover the body, which was still warm, and believing that life was not yet extinct he had placed the body in his wagon and brought it to my office, along with the leathern valise which he had found lying in the road near at hand.

Marks was summoned to appear before the coroner at the inquest and gave his testimony as follows:

"My name is James Marks. I am a resident of the state of New York. I am a farmer and reside on a farm three miles from Mayburg. I was in Mayburg on the 10th of September and remained till about 8 o'clock in the evening. I then left by the south road leading to Bartlett's Station. When about a half mile from town and within a short distance of the large stone house that stands near the road at that point, my horses suddenly became frightened at something lying in the road ahead. I tried to pacify them, but they only plunged the more and refused to advance a step.

"I then dismounted from the wagon, and walking a few steps ahead of the team I discovered the body of a man lying in the road. The moon was shining, but the shadows of the trees where I had stopped made it quite dark. I did not see or hear any one near the place. I supposed at first that the man in the road was drunk, but when I took hold of him I found his clothing was wet, and lighting a match I discovered that my hands were wet with blood. I saw the deceased's face by the light. I had never seen him before. The body was still warm. I thought that life might not be extinct, and I placed the body in my wagon and drove rapidly back to town. I brought the body to the office of Dr. Dixon; also a valise which I found in the road near where the deceased lay. That is all I know of the circumstance."

John Peters, the old gardener at Darkwood Hall, in whose charge the place had been for five years, was summoned and gave his testimony.

He stated that he lived with his wife at Darkwood Hall. They occupied the servants' quarters in the north wing of the building. He was at home on the night of Sept. 10. He heard no unusual sounds. He was a little hard of hearing. The building he occupied stood about 60 yards from the road and about 100 yards from the spot where the deceased had been found. He had come from his work among finger was that of a woman was plainly evident by its size and shape as well as the character of the ring it contained. Here indeed was another mystery, even more perplexing than the first, and the more I reflected over the matter the more puzzled I became. It was a strange enough proceeding that the deceased should carry a human finger about with him in that manner, but the presence of the diamond ring thereon served to intensify the mystery that surrounded the whole affair.

I removed the ring from the finger for the purpose of discovering any initials or inscription that might be engraved thereon, but none was found. I had just replaced the contents of the jar, having made no further discoveries, when there came a tap at my office door. Crossing the room, I threw open the shutter and was greeted by the constable.

"I was passing by and just stopped to say that we have arrested the murderer," he said. "I supposed you had not heard of it."

"No. That is indeed news to me," I replied. "Who is it you have arrested?"

"A young man stopping at the Redfield inn—Gerald Rainforth!" was the reply.

CHAPTER II.

Had the earth opened to swallow me I could not have been more surprised than I was at the constable's announcement.

"Gerald Rainforth arrested for murder!" I gasped in astonishment. "Surely there must be some dreadful mistake!"

The officer shook his head.

"I hope the young man will be able to prove himself clear," he said, "but the detectives claim to have some very strong evidence against him."

"It is all a terrible mistake. He is as innocent of any crime as you or I."

"I hope so, but we can't always judge by appearances."

"Where have they taken him?"

"To the Mayburg jail." And with this the officer bade me good afternoon and walked up the street.

I threw myself into a chair and began to reflect on the startling news I had just heard. I must go to Gerald Rainforth at once. I had no doubt of his innocence and felt confident of his speedy release. Perhaps he could easily explain how it happened that he had been suspected of committing the crime. I knew that the detectives, hoping to gain the reward, would jump at the most flimsy plea to arrest some one.

A half hour later I called at the jail. I found Gerald seated by the grated window, calmly puffing a cigar while he perused the columns of a late New York paper.

He greeted me warmly as I came in, then pushed me a chair and bade me be seated with an air as calm and unruffled as if nothing had happened.

"In the name of heaven, what does this mean, Gerald?" I exclaimed.

"Only another blunder of those stupid, blockhead detectives," he answered care-

"Yes, but it was many, many years ago. While a student at the medical college in New York I met a Horace Rainforth. We became classmates and warm friends."

"He was my father," replied the young man.

"Is it possible?" I said in astonishment. "You say he was your father? He is——" no near relative upon earth. I have heard my father speak of you frequently, and when I came to Mayburg I resolved to make your acquaintance."

There was something in the manner and frank, open countenance of the young man that impressed me in his favor on the instant. I held out my hand.

"I am glad to make your acquaintance," I said, pressing his hand. "Not merely because your father was one of my warmest friends, but because I think I shall like you."

"Thank you. Then I may come and chat with you occasionally?" he asked almost appealingly. "It is so stupid here."

"I shall be glad to have you come whenever you feel inclined," I replied. And so it happened that our acquaintance soon ripened into the warmest friendship. He came to my office frequently, and we passed many pleasant hours together. I was surprised to find that he had read many odd works on medicine and surgery while in the east, but what impressed me most was his familiarity with curious and abstruse subjects. All the established theories of transcendentalism and occult philosophy seemed to be at his tongue's end, yet he would often smile at the absurdity of them all.

"The theories of these writers are all fog," he once remarked, "simply that and nothing more. They shroud in mystery what they do not understand. Theosophy is but the distorted and imperfect reflection of a great truth whose light is just beginning to cast its first faint glimmer upon the world. The mysterious Thibetan theosophist, the Mahatmas, are a myth—except as they appear in the form of the beggar jugglers and vulgar snake charmers of the orient—and an invention of those who, having caught a gleam of the truth, seek to mystify rather than enlighten.

"But behind all this," he went on in a more serious tone, "are forces that make themselves felt in us all at times. They come to us in our dreams—in our waking hours—something we cannot analyze, yet cannot deny the truth of its existence."

He had traveled a great deal and had had some strange adventures in the semi-barbarous countries of the east, of which he regaled me with many an interesting tale. But the most romantic of all his adventures had its beginning in Rome. But there, I must not get ahead of my story.

It was on the 10th of September, just three months subsequent to my first meeting with young Rainforth, that a most mysterious tragedy occurred in Mayburg. It was the first incident of the kind that had been known in the history of the town, and it once excited a feeling of horror among the peaceful inhabitants, which grew in intensity as the mystery surrounding the incident deepened.

An unknown man had been murdered and his body found lying in the road just outside the limits of the village, and within a stone's throw of Darkwood Hall, an imposing but gloomy old building of gray stone, whose owner, Isaac Dangerfield, a wealthy New York broker, had been deigned to make it his abode for even a short season.

The murdered man was about 30 years of age and dressed in a neatly fitting suit of dark gray material, but the strictest inquiry failed to disclose his identity. Near him was found a small leathern valise, which contained a few articles of wearing the shrubbery at 6 o'clock and had remained in the house till about 8; then he had crossed the lawn to bring a scythe he had left. He was returning with it when he saw a man hurrying across the lawn toward the front gate. He did not recognize the man. He saw his face in the moonlight. It was not the face of the deceased. He did not speak to the stranger. He was surprised at seeing him there, but it was not very uncommon for people to pass through the grounds. He thought he would recognize the man if he saw him again.

The ticket agent at Bartlett's Station was next called and stated that a man answering the description of the deceased had come in on the 4.30 train from the east. He had got off the train there, but the agent did not see which way he had gone when he left the station. The man was a stranger to him. He could not state positively that the man seen at the station and the deceased were the same. There was a strong resemblance between the two if they were not the same.

Several others gave their testimony, but no clew to the murdered man's identity or his murderer was obtained. Jack Peters, the Darkwood gardener, was the only one gave any testimony that was likely to afford anything like a clew to the murderer, but unless the stranger whom he had seen passing through the grounds should prove to have had some connection with the murder even this would be worthless. A strict inquiry was made to ascertain who the man was, but all efforts were futile.

The inquest consumed a whole day, but no light was thrown upon the mystery surrounding the tragedy, and the coroner's jury brought in a verdict that the deceased, whose name was unknown, had come to his death by a wound inflicted by a knife in the hands of some one unknown.

The peaceful and quiet village of Mayburg, whose very nature was utterly antagonistic to everything sensational, rarely had its sober dignity disturbed by any unusual occurrence, and, as may be imagined, this startling and tragic event occasioned the most intense excitement. The whole community was shocked and indignant that such a deed could be perpetrated in their very midst and the criminal escape detection.

Keenly alive to the ignominy that the daring deed reflected upon the good name of the town, the mayor called the council together and offered a reward of $1,000 for the apprehension and conviction of the murderer.

This action resulted in bringing several detectives to the place, who at once set to work to unravel the mystery. Meantime photographs of the murdered man had been taken, after which his body was embalmed and laid to rest in the village cemetery.

On the evening of the third day after the murder I was sitting in my office, reflecting over the incident, when my eyes happened to encounter the valise which had been found with the murdered man. It lay in the corner of the room, where it had been left after the inquest. Moved by a sudden impulse, I took up the valise, and opening it began to examine the contents, with the vague hope that I might hit upon something overlooked by the coroner's jury which might furnish a clew to the mysterious affair.

I first examined the few articles of clothing for marks, but could find none. I then took the three novels and turned the leaves carefully through each one, hoping to find a bit of writing on some of the margins, but not a mark was to be found. Taking up the small black glass jar previously referred to, I removed the glass stopper. Apparently it contained nothing but about eight ounces of alcohol. After a short examination of the contents I was about to replace the stopper when on a sudden turning of the jar a low metallic sound came from the inside. It was evident that there was something in the jar, but peering in through the neck I could see nothing.

I then poured the liquid into a glass, and turning the jar mouth downward something fell out upon the table. I picked it up, an exclamation of astonishment escaping my lips as I did so. It was a human finger.

I am not a nervous man, and being a physician and surgeon it might naturally be supposed that my experience in the dissecting room and hospital had rendered me indifferent to such sights, yet I must confess that the unexpected discovery of that bit of human anatomy gave me an unpleasant start.

The finger, which was the first of the left hand, was small and shapely and was encircled by a plain gold ring set with a single diamond of great brilliancy. That the blockhead detectives, he answered carelessly. "I suppose they thought it necessary to arrest some one, and I happened to be the victim selected. I hope they won't detain me long," he added, "for I have planned to be off for France within a week."

I was surprised at his expressed intention to go away so soon, but I felt greatly relieved to know that he regarded his arrest so lightly and had confidence in speedy release.

I remained with him for nearly an hour, but to my surprise he gave no hint of any circumstances regarding his arrest. In fact, he seemed to wish to avoid the subject altogether, and I left him more mystified than ever. On my way to the office I met the Mayor of Mayburg. He had just had an interview with the detective who had caused the arrest to be made, but that individual, like all those in his profession, was very reticent regarding the affair, but seemed very positive in his belief that the right man had been captured. He had stated, however, that Jack Peters, the gardener at Darkwood Hall, had recognized young Rainforth as the man he had seen passing through the grounds on the night of the murder. He had other evidence, he asserted, which would be brought forward at the proper time.

In spite of the light manner in which young Rainforth regarded the affair I recognized the fact that matters were assuming a serious complexion. He was a comparative stranger in the place. Even I, who was perhaps more intimately acquainted with him than anybody in Mayburg, knew little of his past history, and it was plain to see how easily suspicion might point to him, being the only stranger in the village.

Was it really he whom the gardener had seen at Darkwood Hall on that fatal night? If so, what errand could have taken him thither? He had never mentioned the matter to me. Then it was claimed that there were other things back of this which would be made known at the proper time. It did not require much reflection for me to see that, although I felt convinced of the young man's innocence, there might be woven about him such a network of circumstantial evidence as to give him far more trouble than he dreamed to escape from its meshes.

As I walked on toward my office the surprising intelligence I had just received gave me ample food for reflection. Then another event had occurred, which, had it happened at any other time, would have caused considerable comment. The master of Darkwood Hall, so the report ran, had at last come to make his abode in his long neglected country seat. Strange servants had been seen about the place, and a young woman of surpassing loveliness—evidently the daughter of old Isaac Dangerfield—had been seen walking in the grounds. When they had arrived no one seemed to know, for the recent murder had so absorbed the attention of the inhabitants of Mayburg that they gave little heed to events of a social character.

It was almost sunset when I reached my office. To my surprise, I found a servant from Darkwood Hall waiting for me with a carriage. He informed me that my services were required at the hall at once. Miss Dangerfield was very ill—in fact, she was lying in an unconscious condition at that moment—and the housekeeper had despatched him for a physician with instructions to make all possible haste.

As soon as I could enter my office and get my case I climbed into the carriage and was driven rapidly away. From the servant, who was very talkative and volunteered to impart a great deal of information, I learned that Isaac Dangerfield had died a year before, and that his daughter Grace, now the sole mistress of the hall, had arrived there with her servants on the 9th inst. and would probably make the place her permanent abode.

The mysterious tragedy which had taken place so near the hall, the servant informed me, had completely unstrung the nerves of the young lady. She had been fearfully shocked and horrified at the event and had for days been confined to her room, and now her symptoms had grown decidedly alarming.

On reaching the hall I was met at the door by the housekeeper, a kindly-faced woman of about 40, who conducted me through a long wide hall and up a flight of stairs. Then, passing through another hall, I was ushered into a room occupying the eastern wing of the building. Every article of furniture in the room betokened opulence and exquisite taste, and upon a luxurious couch, from a curiously fashioned dragon shaped chandelier overhead, a cluster of waxen tapers shed a subdued radiance, revealing the face and arms of a young woman of surpassing beauty. Her face was of the purest type—olive tinted, with traces of suffering about the delicate mouth. Her eyes were closed, and her hair trailed in a dark wavy mass across the snowy pillow.

The nurse, who was seated by the bedside, arose as I entered.

"I think she is better now," she said in a low tone. "She must have fainted, for she was unconscious for some time, but she revived, and now she has fallen asleep."

I seated myself by the couch and laid my hand gently on the patient's wrist. Her pulse was a little weak now, but there was no indication of any specific complaint aside from what might have been occasioned by undue excitement or overtaxed strength. I readily perceived that all she needed was rest and quiet and perfect freedom from all mental disturbance. I prepared a soothing mixture, which I instructed the nurse to administer to her when she should awake, but not to disturb her on any account as long as she would sleep.

I remained nearly a half hour to see if the patient would awake, but as she did not and seemed to be resting quietly I rose to leave. As I did so my movement caused her to move uneasily upon her pillow, and drawing her left hand from beneath the coverlet she threw it across her breast. As my eyes rested for one moment on the shapely hand I gave a start of astonishment. The first finger was mising!

Like a flash, the finding of the human finger in the murdered man's valise came to me, causing me to stand there for several moments as if in a dream. The nurse must have noticed my agitation, for stepping noiselessly to my side she threw a light covering across the sleeper's breast, casting a glance of impatience and displeasure at me at the same time.

Quickly recovering myself, I gave a few orders regarding the medicine I had left, then quitted the apartment and was conducted to the outside, where the carriage was waiting to carry me back to the village.

On reaching my office I found other calls awaiting me, and it was almost 12 o'clock before I was permitted to retire for the night. But it was 2 before I closed my eyes in sleep, for the strange discoveries I had made during the day rendered sleep impossible and kept my mind greatly disturbed.

Was it possible that the object found in the dead man's luggage could in any way be connected with the young mistress of Hall, of Miss Dangerfield's sudden illness and the discovery that one of her fingers was missing.

A look of utter astonishment and perplexity crossed his face at my revelation.

"It's something that I can't understand," he remarked after a long pause. "It is very strange—very strange."

"It is indeed," I answered, "and I think the facts ought to be given to the detectives at once."

"No, no," he said, with sudden energy. "Keep your discoveries a secret for the present. I have good reasons for asking this—reasons which you shall know in due time."

"But surely this matter ought to be investigated at once," I replied, not a little puzzled at this strange request. "You are accused of a great crime, and it is my duty as well as yours to see that everything relating to the matter should be brought to light."

"I know it," he replied, "but I should prefer that you keep your discoveries a secret for a short time at least. Remember that I ask this thinking it is for the best."

"But the preliminary examination is set for this evening, and there is no time for delay."

"Never fear about that. I will consult with my attorney and then decide on some course of action. We can introduce you as a witness if we think proper to do so."

"Just as you please," I replied. "I am willing to do whatever you advise."

At this instant the jailer came to the door and announced that a gentleman was waiting to see the prisoner.

"It's my attorney," said Gerald. Then to the jailer, "Show him in immediately."

Thrusting the manuscript which the young man had given me into my pocket, I withdrew from the room, promising to be present at the preliminary examination.

It is hardly necessary to state that I was considerably mystified at young Rainforth's strange conduct, yet I saw no course left but to follow his advice. He was certainly the most interested party in the affair and would doubtless do what was most to his own advantage.

My calls kept me busy till near the middle of the afternoon. Then eating a hurried lunch I started for the court-house, not yet having found time to read the manuscript Gerald had given me. What strange story the manuscript had to tell I was very anxious to ascertain, but it was far more important that I be present at the preliminary.

When I reached the little courthouse, I found it already well filled with an eager, expectant crowd, all anxious to catch every detail of the terrible case. Edging my way through the mass of humanity, I managed to obtain a seat inside the railing near the prisoner, where I was introduced to Gerald's attorney, who was one of the great criminal lawyers of the metropolis.

The attorney for the state was a shrewd man and possessed great ability as a criminal lawyer, and I knew that he would make a strong fight. What evidence he was to present against the prisoner was not known.

While the prosecuting attorney was getting ready to open the case Rainforth called me to his side, and we conversed in a low tone for some time. He was not going to make any fight, he informed me, save as far as it was necessary to enable him to be released on bail. He would shortly be in possession of evidences, he confidently asserted, which would not only result in establishing his own innocence, but would secure the conviction of the real criminal. How this evidence was to be obtained or what was its character he gave no hint. He would introduce no evidence at the preliminary examination—in fact, he had none to offer at present, he said—but he felt confident that no evidence could be offered against him of sufficient importance to prevent his being admitted to bail.

The first witness called for the prosecution was James Marks, who had discovered the body of the murdered man. His testimony was substantially the same as that given at the inquest. The next witness was Jack Peters, the gardener at Darkwood Hall.

He stated that he saw the prisoner passing through the grounds at the hall about 8 o'clock on the night of the murder. He had seen his face distinctly in the moonlight. He was coming from the direction of the house and going toward the spot where the murder had taken place. He did not know the man at the time, but had seen and recognized him while in Mayburg a few days later. He was positive that the prisoner was the same man he had seen in the Darkwood Hall grounds.

The next witness to take the stand was Webb Davis, a laborer. The substance of his testimony was as follows:

"My name is Webb Davis. I am a laborer and reside on the [illegible]

The blade was almost covered with blood. The knife was passed to the justice, and a great sensation ran through the courtroom.

But at that instant there was a little stir near the door. Those who were packed in the aisle began to move aside to allow some one to pass who was approaching through the crowd. Presently a woman richly dressed came through the aisle. She wore a thick veil over her face. Approaching the sheriff, she said something in a low tone. Instantly the officer conducted her forward to the justice's desk.

"If your honor pleases," the officer said, "here is a lady that wants to be put on the witness stand. She states that she has a confession to make that will clear up the whole mystery surrounding this case."

A wave of excitement ran like an electric thrill through the audience.

"Let her come forward, and be sworn," said the justice.

The prosecuting attorney arose quickly, evidently believing that this was some subtle manœuvre of the defence.

"If it please your honor, I object to this witness taking the stand," he said. "This is an unusual proceeding, and I ask that Mr. Judd be allowed to continue his testimony."

Rainforth's attorney came forward and was about to address the court when the justice said:

"I overrule the gentleman's objections. The lady will please take the stand and be sworn."

The lady advanced and threw back her veil, revealing the face of Grace Dangerfield of Darkwood Hall. As she reached the stand she staggered like one groping in the darkness, her face as white as death. She stretched out her hands as if grasping some invisible support. Then she spoke, despair and agony in her face and voice:

"It—it was I who committed the murder!" And with the words upon her lips she sank down in an apparently lifeless heap upon the floor.

Sergeant McElroy's Whereabouts.

"The Ninth Cavalry was the first regiment to use the Hotchkiss mountain gun," said Capt. Day, "and the way that gun was hauled about by our troop was a caution. Lieut. Humphrey commanded the gun outfit in our troop, and he could hit an ordinary target with it as far as it could be seen.

"He was a very profane man, and whenever any of the boys got weary on a march they would say: 'Let's go back and hear Humphrey swear.' In marching over mountains it is very often necessary to climb down inclines which are almost a sheer drop, and at such places the soldier will sit down between the forelegs of his horse and they slide down together.

"The gun outfit, always being in the rear, would generally find such places worn about as smooth as glass when they came up, and Humphrey's profanity then was something terrible. I remember one very amusing incident connected with an affair of that sort. The incline was almost a sheer precipice, leading thirty feet below into the canon. When Humphrey came up, of course, all the dirt was worn off, leaving only the slippery side of the rock.

"He sat down and swore long and loudly, but finally got up and ordered the outfit over. The sergeant, a colored man named McElroy, was about to let the gun and the two mules go over by themselves, when Humphrey yelled: 'Hold on there, blank, blank, etc., go over with 'em and report.'

"So over they all went, and after hearing a big splash in the canon below, followed by silence, Humphrey called out:

"'McElroy, are you killed?'

"A big spluttering was heard below, and pretty soon McElroy's voice came up: 'No, sah; Ise not killed.'

"'Where's the mule?'

"'He's kickin' on top o' de heap, sah.'

"'Well, where's the wheel mule?'

"'He's under de off mule, sah.'

WORKING THE CONDUCTOR.

A Shawnee Granger Who Got off at His Farm and Saved a Walk—An Old Story With a Fresh Spring Flavor.

He may have been a hayseed. He looked it; but way down deep in his eyes the second time you looked you seemed to notice a suspicion of real "slickness" that escaped you at first.

He held a ticket to Tecumseh when he got on the train at Topeka, and he gave it up promptly to the conductor on demand.

When the conductor came through the train after it had left Tecumseh, he was surprised to see the same man sitting comfortably in the same seat.

"Ticket," said the conductor.

"Haven't got any," said the man.

"Then you'll have to pay," said the conductor.

"Can't do it," said the man.

"Then I'll have to put you off," said the conductor.

"What right out here in the country?" asked the man.

"Right out here in the country," replied the conductor.

A good many of the other passengers were interested at once and the argument continued. The conductor noticed—he said afterward—that the man kept looking out of the window as he talked and did not seem to be in a hurry. Of course the train was running all the time.

The farmer finally went down into his pocket and got out his purse. He was not in a hurry about it and after he had opened it seemed lost in thought.

"Come," said the conductor, "I can't fool with you all day."

"Must pay or get off, eh?" asked the farmer.

"I said that," replied the man with the punch. There was another moment's silence. The farmer took another look out of the window.

"I guess you can put me off," he said.

The train was stopped and the conductor went with the man to the rear platform to see that he got off and stayed off.

"See that white house over there?" asked the son of toil.

The conductor could see it easily.

"That's where I work," said the farmer. "This is the nearest the railroad comes to it. I am much obliged to you for letting me off here. I was afraid I wouldn't be able to keep you interested till we got here. Have a cigar?" and the granger jumped lightly to the ground and was gone.

The train was two minutes behind time before the conductor recovered his breath.

"Well, I'll be ——," he said in an humbled tone, and then he went in and kicked the newsboy.—Topeka Journal.

Bicycle Force.

A French scientist has recently made some experiments which show the amount of force developed by some of the bicycle experts in a hard race. Windle and Zimmerman have maintained for two minutes a speed to continue which required the expenditure of energy representing two thirds of one-horse power. For six seconds they were able to exert the astonishing force of one and a fourth horse power. This is equivalent to raising a weight of 188 pounds one yard high in a second. This is a conservative estimate, owing to the inefficiency of the coefficients of power used in making the calculations.

Experiments are also being made to determine the force exerted by the different sports. These results will be of use for training as a hygienic data. One of the discoveries made during the calculation of the force exercised by [illegible] lists is that at high speed[illegible] a bicyclist in covering [illegible]

PERHAPS

I SEATED MYSELF ON THE COUCH AND LAID MY HAND GENTLY ON THE PATIENT'S WRIST.

Darkwood Hall? The finger missing from her hand corresponded in every way with the one found in the murdered man's effects, yet it seemed absurd to look upon the matter save in the light of a coincidence. But in spite of my efforts to dismiss the matter from my mind it kept coming up, like Banquo's ghost, and wouldn't be downed.

At last a conviction began to take possession of me that there was something more than a mere coincidence in the affair and ought to be investigated. Should I communicate my discoveries to the detectives and have the matter investigated? This seemed the only course left for me to pursue, yet I hesitated to use evidence that had come into my possession through a professional call.

So the thoughts over the affair kept my mind agitated till late at night, and then I finally decided to lay all the facts before young Rainforth and consult with him as to how I should proceed.

From what I had learned from the garrulous servant it appeared that the mistress of Darkwood Hall had arrived on the 9th of the month. On the night of the 10th the murder had been committed. From this it was plain that she was at the hall when the tragedy had taken place, yet I was confident that this fact had not been known at the time the inquest had been held. If so, why had not some member of the household besides Jack Peters been summoned to testify before the coroner's jury.

The murdered man was a stranger. He had arrived at the place on the day following the arrival of the occupants of Darkwood Hall. He had been found within a stone's throw of the house, murdered, and added to these facts was the discovery I had made regarding the missing finger. All these facts taken together forced the conviction upon my mind that the mistress of Darkwood Hall was in some strange and inexplicable way mixed up in the terrible affair, yet from what I have seen of her it was impossible for me to believe she had been guilty of any crime.

But as a duty I owed not only to justice, but to one who was my friend, I was resolved to make an investigation of the matter.

Early on the following morning I called on Gerald Rainforth, who was still confined in the jail awaiting preliminary examination. I found him still cheerful regarding the prospect of his release, yet I could notice a gloomy cast upon his countenance at times, which plainly told of some deep mental trouble.

"Do you know," I said after we had exchanged friendly greetings, "that the gardener at Darkwood Hall claims to identify you as the man he saw passing through the grounds at the hall on the night of the murder?"

I saw him start visibly as I made the announcement, and for a moment he remained silent. Then he said:

"Of course that proves nothing."

"Certainly not," I went on, "but it is a very unfortunate circumstance that the old gardener should make such a stupid mistake."

"But it isn't a mistake," he answered.

"What! Then it was really you whom he saw on the grounds that night?"

"Yes."

I looked at him in astonishment. He noticed my look and added:

"Of course you are surprised at my being there at that time?"

I nodded assent.

He arose and paced the room for several moments, his head bent as if in deep thought. Then he walked to a table by the window, and picking up a roll of manuscript came and laid it in my hand.

"This will explain matters to you," he said. "You are the only friend I have on earth in whom I can confide. When you have read this, come to me, and I will tell you of my plans. I have telegraphed to New York for my attorney and a detective. They arrived early this morning, and I am now expecting them every moment."

"I thank you for your confidence," I said, "and let me assure you that whatever circumstances may point to the contrary I shall never question your innocence."

He pressed my hand warmly.

"I am more than grateful for your friendship and the assurance of your confidence in my innocence," he replied. "I trust soon to prove to you that it has not been misplaced."

"Gerald," I said, "I have made some important discoveries in this case, and it was to acquaint you with these that I came this morning."

I then related the circumstance of my discovering the human finger containing the diamond ring in the murdered man's three miles southwest of Mayburg, in the State of New York. I am employed as a farm laborer by Mr. Bentley. I was in Mayburg on Sept. 10. I came on foot. I left for home about 8 o'clock. I did not go by the road, but to shorten my journey I took a near cut through the Darkwood park. When about midway of the park and about an eighth of a mile from the road, I saw a man coming at a rapid walk from the direction of the hall and traveling toward Mayburg. I stopped in the shadow of a tree. He passed within a rod of where I stood. I saw his face in the moonlight. He did not see me, to my knowledge. I recognize the prisoner here as the man seen in the park."

John Judd, the porter at the Redfield inn, was the next witness. I will only give the leading points of his testimony, which were as follows:

"I am employed as porter at the Redfield inn. I have known the prisoner since the 1st of last July, when he came to the inn to stay. He is a painter and has two of the best rooms in the house. He has always paid liberally for everything he received. He spent a good deal of his time sketching scenes in the vicinity of Mayburg. He was at the inn on Sept. 10. About half past 6 on the evening of the 10th he left the inn. He did not return till between 8 and 9 o'clock. I was on the porch as he came in. He seemed greatly disturbed, for he paced restlessly up and down the porch for some time. Then he went to his room. I don't think he retired. I went to bed at about 10. I think it was almost midnight when I was awakened by hearing voices in the office below. I got up and dressed and went down stairs. As I passed the room occupied by the prisoner I saw that a light was still burning. He was not in the habit of leaving his light burning after retiring.

"I found the constable in the office talking with the proprietor. He (the officer) informed me that a murder had been committed and wanted to know if there were any strangers staying at the place. I went down to Dr. Dixon's office and saw the murdered man. I didn't see the prisoner among the crowd there. I think he remained at the inn. He seemed out of sorts for days after the murder and spoke of going abroad soon and got me to assist him in packing some of his things. On the second day after the murder I was cutting some weeds in the yard when I found this knife under the prisoner's window.

Here the witness produced a large pocketknife, with a blade about 5 inches long, which opened and fastened with a catch,

Catarrh in the Head

Is a dangerous disease because it is liable to result in loss of hearing or smell, or develop into consumption. Read the following:

"My wife has been a sufferer from catarrh for the past four years and the disease had gone so far that her eyesight was affected so that for nearly a year she was unable to read for more than five minutes at a time. She suffered severe pains in the head and at times was almost distracted. About Christmas, she commenced taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, and since that time has steadily improved. She has taken six bottles of Hood's Sarsaparilla and is on the road to a complete cure. I cannot speak too highly of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and I cheerfully recommend it." W. H. Exchange Grocery.

Three months is the time given us by some of our well wishing friends to stay in business. Perhaps that is too long, however. We have a fine stock of groceries to choose from, and if three months is the limit some body will get the benefit of our mistake. Why not you? We do not pretend to have the only first class goods in town, nor have we any cheap John goods to advertise. Our stock is now complete. We have a full stock of the best grades of sugars, teas, coffee, confectionery, tobacco, canned goods, spices, biscuits, flour, etc. We open at 6 a.m. to accommodate our town trade, and keep open till 10 p.m. to accommodate the farmers. We are short of first class butter, poultry, and eggs, and pay the highest price in cash for the same. Cord wood warted. The Exchange Grocery, west side of the market.

22 Mrs. S. R. PERCY.

Eloped with Another Man's Wife.

Mr. John Haight, who was released from gaol last week, his wife refusing to appear against him to establish the charges preferred by her of non support and abuse, has left town, and rumor says that he went not alone. Mrs. Pringle, the wife of a highly respected citizen, who resides across the river, is said to have cast in her lot with him and the guilty couple are supposed to be now at the Cape. Haight left Napanee on Thursday of last week for Kingston, and the following day Mrs. Pringle departed for the same place taking four of the children with her. They are supposed to have met there, by arrangement, and to have departed for the States together. It is alleged that Haight and Mrs. Pringle have been unduly intimate for the past year. Haight had $140 on him when arrested last week, and Mrs Pringle is said to have considerable money in her possession. The injured husband has no desire to see his wife again. Mrs. Haight, who is a perfect lady and highly respected, is heart broken over the affair.

The Steamer Merritt.

The steamer Merritt made a trial trip to Napanee on Saturday to ascertain if the channel was deep enough to accomodate her. She experienced no difficulty in making the trip. While the Merritt was in port an EXPRESS representative had a look over her. The Merritt has undergone some extensive alterations and improvements and presents a very handsome appearance. She has had five new staterooms put in on the upper deck, a forecastle has been constructed, and a new stairway has been put in from the main to upper deck. The wheel-house has been raised, and a candy store has been erected on the forward main deck. A long felt want has been filled by the erection of a dining room and kitchen in the aft of the main deck, and passengers desiring it can now be accommodated with meals on board the boat. The Merritt has been nicely painted, and everything is in a spick and span condition, and she will no doubt prove very popular with excursionists this summer. Capt. James Collier is again in command this year, and is as bluff, genial and hearty as ever.

Jersey Ice Cream at Davis'

about 300, felt themselves fully competent to do the task. On several occasions during the match the onlookers held opinions contrary to those of the referee, and stuck to them so pertenaciously that the referee was forced of necessity to reverse his decisions. In Napanee Mr. Grange is looked upon as an authority on foot ball, but the good people of Sydenham appear to be possessed of a few large sized pointers that are not down in the book. The first goal was scored by Sydenham. The Napaneeans shot shortly afterwards and claimed a goal, which was allowed by the referee. At this juncture the spectators crowded on to the field and demonstrated that it was no goal, and their contentions were allowed. The next goal was scored by Sydenham, and shortly afterwards Napanee scored. Up to this time Napanee had been putting up a slow game, but during the last fifteen minutes play they woke up, and rained shot after shot on the Sydenham's plucky and excellent goal keeper. During the last few minutes play two of Sydenham's players deliberately fouled the ball in front of goal, thereby keeping it from scoring. Napanee claimed the penalty kick, which such conduct entitles them to, but the spectators again surged on the field, and would not allow it, so our boys put on their coats and left the field. The game was awarded to Sydenham on a score of 2 to 1. The boys speak highly of the treatment accorded them by the Sydenham foot ball team

Napanee District Meeting.

The Annual Meeting of the Napanee District of the Methodist church was held in the Eastern Methodist church on Thursday May 23rd. The chairman of the district, Rev. F. B. Stratton presided. The morning session was ministerial, and on ballot Rev. W. B. Tucker, M. A., Ph D. was elected secretary, and on nomination Rev. W. G. Clarke, B. A., was appointed assistant. The session was devoted to the examination of ministerial character which passed satisfactorily, and to the reception of candidates for the ministry. Four young men, Louis S. Wight, Joseph M. Whyte, C. Henry Shepherd and Archibald H. C. Huffman, recommended by Deseronto, Selby, Bath and Yarker Official Boards respectively, were recommended to the ensuing Conference at Picton as Candidates for the Ministry.

The afternoon session consisted of ministerial and lay members. The chairman of District presided. On the ballot for secretary, the secretary of the morning was again elected, and Dr. Meacham M. P. P., and Rev. W. Coombe were chosen as assistants. Rev. D. O. Crossley and W. F. Hall, Esq., were appointed to audit the circuit schedules. The returns show that there are 3896 members of the church in the District, an increase of 16 on last year; 346 members of the Quarterly Official Boards; 19 Young People's Societies with a total membership of 858; 36 Sunday schools with a total attendance of 3,301; and 319 copies of the Christian Guardian are taken against 74 copies last year. In the financial work, monetary stringency has been felt in many quarters and the returns show some falling off. Rev. Dr. McDiarmid was elected to represent the district on the Sationing Committee; Rev. H. I. Allen and A. L. Morden, Esq., on the Sabbath School Committee; Rev. W. G. Clarke, B. A., and Dr. Meacham, M. P. P., on the Epworth League Committee; Rev. W. B. Seccombe and Jno. B. Aylsworth, Esq., on the Sustentation Fund Committee; and W. F. Hall, Esq., on the Annual Conference Missionary Committee. The following laymen were elected as lay-delegates to the Annual Conference by the laymen present:—Uriah Wilson M. P., M. S. Madole, W. T. Gibbard, G. A. Cole, J. B. Aylsworth, A. V Price, Dr. Meacham M. P. P., Peter Bristol, J. B. Allison, James Joyce, Henry Wilson, Robt. Miller, James Bell, and C. O. Kaylor.

On motion it was resolved that the next District Meeting be held in the Methodist church in Odessa, that a convention for the promotion of Scriptural Holiness, be held in connection therewith, that Revs. Dr. Tucker, W. B. Seccombe and the chairman of the district, Dr. Meacham, M.P.P., be a committee to arrange the programme, and that on the Sunday preceding all the Ministers of the district preach specially on Scriptural Holiness in all of their churches and urge the people to attend the convention.

On motion a vote of thanks was heartily tendered the people of Napanee for their pleasant hospitality. The meeting closed with the Doxology and Benediction.

BETWEEN YOU AND I.

There are many annoying things in this world, and a great many people are annoyed more or less, I think more. One principal thing which is very annoying especially in this town is while walking along any of our streets to step on a loose plank in the side walk and have the other end come flying up and away you go through space, but, always with a downward tendency. I heard the following the other day which fits in here very nicely and I hope the proper persons will take the hint. For sale, at a bargain. A lot of second hand sidewalks, some have been in use for something less than twenty five years. Apply to chairman of Street Committee. Perhaps if there was an occasional nail or two put in they might bring a higher price.

There is a spot on Bridge street, between the two Methodist churches where an odor arises which is strong enough to lead one to suppose that it was the outlet of New York's sewerage or perhaps a nuisance ground. If any of the Board of Health should happen to pass that way, when they haven't got anything else to do they might be able to share in it to. Of course if they have anything else to do it might be advisable for them to wait until they should happen to pass that way.

The remark "boys will be boys" has often been heard, but to see some of them when they get a bunch of firecrackers and take it into their heads to celebrate, one would be led to think that they were trying to be something else. It was no uncommon sight on May 24th to see boys throw firecrackers at women to scare them and the cracker would generally explode just as it touched the dress. I would advise some of these boys to put a lighted firecracker in their pocket "just for fun."—Dagon.

A barn belonging to W. Doyle, of Mill Haven, was fired by tramps on the 24th.

Gilbert B. Wellman, a farmer of Rawdon, is in the Belleville goal for attempting to take his own life.

A subscriber informs us that chicken theives are getting in their work in the West end of the town.

Mr. Wm. Millar met with a serious accident last Sunday. He slipped on the sidewalk and broke his arm.

S. Rose's barn, drive, slaughter and ice houses, Bloomfield, were burned with contents Monday afternoon 5 o'clock. Cause of fire unknown. Partially covered by insurance.

Sunday night during a heavy thunder storm, a barn belonging to George P. Cole, Big Island, was struck by lightning and burned, together with a quantity of hay and other farm products. Loss about $1,000. Insured for $800.

Past Chancellor Broderick instituted a lodge of Knights of Pythias, Tuesday evening, in the Oddfellow's Hall. About 25 names were on the charter list and several more have since been added. The next meeting will be held Tuesday June 11th at the same place.

Henry Arnold died at Westbrook last week, aged 90 years.

Grimshaw & Co, Fredericksburgh, shipped about 30 tons of hay from Ernestown last week.

Snow fell at Donaldson's Mills on the 21st inst., and the place was also visited with a heavy frost.

The song service in the E. M. Church on Sunday evening was largely attended, and much appreciated.

Ex-Ald. George W. Robinson, carriage builder, Kingston, died on Friday with hemorrhage of the lungs.

That tired feeling, loss of appetite and nervous prostration are driven away by Hood's Sarsaparilla, which makes pure blood.

Miss Clemmie Clancy, of Centreville, wheeled from Napanee to Kingston on the 24th of May in two hours and forty-five minutes.

The claims of Rev. F. B. Stratton as president of the Bay of Quinte Conference are to the front. Mr. Stratton would make ar ideal president.

A Lalonde, of Napanee, was entered in the bicycle races at Kingston on Saturday. He didn't win any money, but the Whig says his exhibition of fancy riding was much enjoyed.

Mr. Geo. W. Robinson, carriage builder, of Kingston, died on Saturday after a few days illness. He was well and favorably known in this district, having been one of our prominent exhibitors at our county fairs in past years.

J. L. Boyes' Daisy S. took pecond place in the free for all races at Picton on the 24th. There was three enteries for this race, but only two started, Daisy S. and Z. Herringtons Commonwealth. It was an exciting race and was trotted in good time, 2.22¼.

You've No Idea how nicely Hood's Sarsaparilla hits the needs of the people who feel all tired out or run down from any cause. It seems to oil up the whole mechanism of the body so that all moves smoothly and work becomes delight. If you are weak, tired and nervous, Hood's Sarsaparilla is just what you need. Try it.

A. Madden's Nellie M. B. was entered in the running race at Kingston on the 24th, but in the second lap of the second heat, while running well for third, she fell, throwing her jockey, Jenkins, of Toronto, violently to the ground, and rolling over him. Strange to say neither horse nor rider were much injured.

While Mr. and Mrs. Atwell were driving down a hill near Olden station on the 15th inst., the pole of the buggy dropped to the ground, and the sudden jar threw the old couple out. Mr. Atwell struck his head against a rock and he died in about an hour. Mrs. Atwell was seriously injured also, and it is doubtful if she will recover.

The most palatable preparation of Cod Liver Oil in the world is Miller's Emulsion, and is now being taken by invalids with astonishing success. Miller's is "the kind that cures" coughs, colds, bronchitis and all throat and lung troubles. Every bottle warranted. No oily taste like others. In big bottles, 50c. and $1.00, at druggists,

Four of the excursionists from Watertown, who visited Kingston on the 24th of May decided to signalize the event by getting married. The two couples secured their licenses from Mr. Gildersleeve, and ex-Ald Allen, who was present, invited the would be benedicts to his residence, where his father, the Rev. H. I. Allen, of Napanee, was visiting, and the couples were duly and becomingly married by that gentleman.

The first cricket match was played yesterday between home teams. All showed up in good style, both in batting and fielding. Mr. Richardson got the score of the day, 29 not out. Dr. Leonard next, the total score 1st side 48, 2nd. 68. A match is expected to be played in Picton on the 7th of June.

Mr. I. H. Walker' of Walker Bro's Uncle Tom's Cabin Company, of Napanee and Deseronto paid a flying visit to Peterboro, on Monday, May 27, returning by way of Napanee and Tweed thence to Portodufort, Quebec, where the Company is enjoying extreme prosperity playing to packed houses and turning the people away at Athens, Arnprior and Pembroke, all well pleased.

Mrs. D. H. McDonald died suddenly in Wolfe Island on the 25th inst.

Deseronto beat Kingston at cricket on the 24th by thirteen runs and one wicket.

The Watson manufacturing company, of Ayr, a prosperous firm under a revenue tariff, is now in financial difficulties.

Mr. John A. Tyner's son received a severe shaking up by having a team run away with him. At this date he is getting on very well.

Practically all the benefit from the present boom in wheat prices is going to the speculators. The farmers who raised the grain are getting mighty little good out of it.

At Ottawa the other night some boys attempted to cut the guy ropes of Horner's tent and let the structure down. The police had to be called to disperse the crowd.

With Invalids. Yes! with invalids the appetite is capricious and needs coaxing, that is just the reason they improve so rapidly under Scott's Emulsion, which is as palatable as cream.

The Intelligencer's relay race from Belleville to Kingston will take place on June 10th. Representatives of both bicycle clubs will meet in Napanee this week, where they will exchange their lists of riders and referees.

D. D. Rogers, the patron candidate for Frontenac at the next dominion elections, says he will do all in his power, if elected, to have a bridge built between Howe Island and the main shore. He claims the bridge is a greater necessity than many improvements for which the dominion government voted money in the past.

Farmers wishing to purchase first class Corn for seed will find a car of Mammoth Southern Sweet at Kimmerly's, remember this Corn has been recleaned and handled specially for seeding purposes, and will be sold cheap for cash. Finest Sugar Cured Ham 12c. per lb.

There are many bad characters now working among the farmers in different sections of the province, representing themselves to be agents, when they are really black-hearted swindlers. Be ready for these masked individuals; they may come this way.

A house of ill-fame in Cobden was raided by Chief McDermott, Renfrew, and three of its inmates, Mrs. Beckman, her daughter, Eliza Jane Beckman, and her niece, Mary Jane Mulligan, were arrested, taken to Renfrew and tried before magistrate G. W. McDonald. Mrs. Beckman was sent to Pembroke for trial, her daughter was committed to jail for four months for vagrancy, and the niece was discharged.

PHOTOGRAPHY UP TO DATE.

The Art Seems Now to be Almost at Its Height.

Being photographed nowadays is an an elaborate process. Heretofore, when a woman wanted her photograph taken, she went to the studio and arranged about the size of the picture and the number she wanted. She gave a reassuring touch to her hair, sat down before the camera, turned her head a little to the right or to the left, as the artist desired, and, clamped on either temple, gazed fixedly, insipidly, or

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

MORVEN.

The weather here is very dry and grain and meadows need rain very much. The hay crop is likely to be light. The apple crop will be larger than at first expected. Some of the grain crops are looking well.

Our school is progressing very nicely under the able management of Miss Pollard. Some four or five are intending to write on entrance examinations.

There will (D. V.) be a strawberry and ice cream festival in Brick church, Morven, on Tuesday evening June 25th. Admittance only 25 cents, children 15 cts. An excellent programme consisting of recitations, readings by local and foreign talent, vocal and instrumental music by the choir and others and an address by Rev. Mr. McCullough, of Newburgh. Chair taken at 8 p.m. The committee will spare no pains to make this the entertainment of the season.

BELL ROCK.

The weather is very hot during the day but the nights are fine and cool. We had a heavy rain two weeks ago but none since.

The men have about completed the statute labor which will make quite an improvement in the roads.

Geo. Perault is building a barn 48ft. by 54ft and 41ft. from the ground to the peak.

Segriff Bros delivered 1,380 lbs. of milk at the factory on Monday morning.

Mr. Roach is doing quite a lively trade in his general store.

The teachers of the Sunday School intend holding a picnic on Wed. the 26th of June. We hope the weather will be favorable.

Rev. Mr. Williamson preached his farewell sermon on Sunday. He goes to Gananoque on Wednesday.

The F. M. Services on Sunday, in Verona, drew a large number of people from here.

Visitors.—Mr. Burrill of Napanee at G. M. York's. Mrs. Deline, of Hartington, at Mrs. Martin's. Mrs. Lawson and Maggie Ruttan at Jas. Ruttan's, Fourth Lake.

HAY BAY.

Rain is very much needed through this district, as ploughman says the ground is very dry.

Mr. Elmore Wells, of Prince Edward, is the guest of his sister, Mrs. D. A. McCabe at present.

Miss Daisy McCabe, of Napanee, is spending a few days with her cousin, Miss Mabel McCabe at this place.

Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Sharks and children, of Gretna, were the guests of Mr. J. A. Moore on Sunday last.

Mr. and Mrs. Philip Young, of Gretna, were the guests of Mr. M. E. Post on Sunday last.

Berry picking is all the go, every young man that has a girl is kind enough to assist her father in the berry business.

Mr. Johnston Wagar visited his parents at Sillsville on Sunday last.

What makes so many of our young men go to town on Sunday evenings. They say that is just where the pretty girls are.

It is rumored that a young man from the other shore is good on fishing as he makes it a practice to troll across and back again every Sunday evening, probably a chance of bait would be good for him.

Quite a number from here attended the demonstration at Forester's Island on Monday last.

Mr. Chester Kellar, of this place, was the guest of Mr. John Kellar, of Marysville, on Sunday last.

PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY.

A large number of people from various parts of the county attended the Forester's picnic at Forester Island Park, on Monday last.

Strawberry picking is now the order of the day. The late frosts are said to have injured the strawberry crop considerably in this county.

Rain is badly needed here. The hay in many places will scarcely be worth har-traveller arrived a stranger among strangers, unfamiliar with the language of those he met, with no one to meet him as he expected or to direct him. Unfortunately his baggage had probably been misdirected for it did not arrive with the same train nor with the next, and he has up to date not been able to get any tidings of it. He is however, mo one of the desponding kind and made his way back to Carleton Place, where he got on the right line and succeeded in reading Kaladar Station at last from whence he proceeded to Cloyne. There he fortunately met Chas. P. Stein of this place and the Rev. E. Weber who made room for him in their conveyance and brought him safe to his final destination. He is very favorably impressed with Denbigh, its surroundings and inhabitants and intends to extend his visit at least till September or October next.

During the three weeks in May in which the Denbigh cheese factory has been in operation 38,608 lbs. of milk have been delivered at Lavant Station. G. Stein and Ed. Fritsch took each a load there on Tuesday last.

Herman Glaesar has been building a new frame barn with stone basement stables. August Hartwig, of Bancroft, did the stone mason work in a most creditable manner and Albert Crabtree did the carpenter work in first class style. Reinhold Petzold is building a similar barn this week.

Mr. A. Hartwig has also built the cellars and foundation for the new Lutheran parsonage. The carpenters, a firm from Eganville will probably begin their work on it next week.

Smith's Grocery.

Mr. Jake Smith has recently had plate glass windows put in his grocery store, and in one of the windows, where the vegetables and garden stuff are kept, an ingenious water spray has been erected in the centre, and by this arrangement the vegetables are kept green, fresh and wholesome.

The Dame Durden Society.

Will give a Lawn Social, on the beautiful lawn of Mr. T. G. Carscallen to night. Ice cream, strawberries, and cake will be served. The lawn will be illuminated with Japanese lanterns, and a broom brigade drill will be given. The 47th Batt. Band will be in attendance. Tickets only 15 cents. The proceeds will be devoted to charitable purposes.

Escaped from Gaol.

John Mack the horse thief, who was sentenced to one years imprisonment by Police Magistrate Daly last week, made his escape from the Napanee gaol on Tuesday afternoon. A ladder had been left in the yard, and Mack used it in scaling the wall, first exchanging his prison garb for a suit of clothes that he came across in the kitchen of the gaol. Mack is evidently a cunning rascal. Before receiving his trial he was detected in the act of attempting to file the bars of his cell. He is still at liberty.

Dr. Fred Warner, of Toronto, was home on Sunday and Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. O'Bierne and two children who have been visiting at D. S. Warner's, left for Stratford Monday evening.

Mrs. A. E. Lang was visiting friends in Kingston last week.

Mr. and Mrs. John Thompson and Mrs. Finkle took in the Picnic at Forester's Island, near Desoronto, Monday last.

Warrie and Ted Eakins, sons of Dr. Eakins, wheeled to Napanee Saturday on their bicycle to spend Sunday with Mr. and Mrs. Lang.

Miss Smith, of Utica, after spending two weeks with her sister, Mrs. Stanley C. Warner, left for home Saturday morning, taking Ethel Warner with her.

Mr. and Mrs. Mill and Mr. Isaac Lockwood, of our town, with a number of others took in Brockville excursion.

MARRIAGES.

BAXTER REID—At Napanee, on June 12th, Thos. J. Baxter, Sheffield, to Miss Adda Florence Reid Reidville.

DEATHS.

ELIZA PULTZ.—On June 14th, 1895, at her residence, Wilton, Eliza Pultz, widow of the late Henry Pultz, aged 79 years.

Nature in a playful Mood.

The wind storm on Saturday last caught the front door of Haines & Lockett's boot and shoe store in its gentle clasp and slammed it shut, smashing the $7.50 plate glass in it all to smithereens.

Horse Drowned.

While Andy Kelly was watering his horse at the river down by the old cement works on Tuesday morning, it tripped and fell headlong into the water. The horse was blind, and it swam out into the centre of the river, then turned and made for the shore. When it was climbing up the bank its foot got caught in the halter shank and this swung its head around, and it again struck out into the river. It floundered around in the water for some time, till it became exhausted, and was drowned. The horse was a valuable animal, about four years of age.

BETWEEN YOU AND I.

It seems to me that a fire in a school room, when the thermometer registers 90 in the shade, is just a trifle out of place.

There were some pretty long faces among the school board on Tuesday evening last. Public opinion is very hard to oppose.

If tea and coffee comes in duty free, why? Is it because tea and coffee cannot be grown here, and the interest of a bloated monopolist cannot be interferred with.

If the price of Canadian coal oil is raised through sympathy, because American coal oil is advanced in price, where does the difference in the price go to? It can't be possible that the refiners put it in their pockets. Probably they give it to the temple, gazed fixedly, insipidly, or otherwise, at a spot on the wall. Now the subject's "possibilities" are studied in detail. Nothing is left to accident. The fashionable woman carries her various gowns to the studio with her, and tries them on, each in turn, that the artist may decide which suits her best. She pays $50 for the photographs. Her hair is arranged by skilful hands in different ways, and a style of coiffure may be chosen which will be appropriate not only to the contour of her face and head, but to the environments of the picture. The subject's hands and arms are criticized, likewise her throat and neck, to see whether a severe high costume or an evening gown shall be used. The topics of backgrounds and accessories are discussed. All of these tinted carbon photographs are taken full length. Maybe the subject will pose as a dame of the first empire, with skimpy satin gown, elaborate coiffure, jewelled girdle, fan, vinaigrette. Perhaps she stands half turned about, with her back to the spectator, and her pure profile deftly thrown out on a dark velvet curtain. All women would not look charming in such a picture. The artist knows whom to choose, and the subject will wonder at her own beauty when she sees the picture. A wilful, coquettish girl is posed as a modern Priscilla. The quaint spinning-wheel and high-backed chair, the small-paned window at the back of the colonial room, form a charming contrast with her rich brocade gown and beaming face. The scant, puffed sleeves set off the rounded arms, the curve of the wrist. The hand that grasps the wheel is like a rare old painting, and the undulating outlines of the figure are sugested, not revealed, by the prim folds of the flowered silk rock. These latter-day photographs are like paintings, and are likely never to grow old-fashioned. They have the charm that distinguishes the portrait painters of the old English school. A charm that custom will not stale. They will not become out of date and grotesque, like the photographs of twenty years ago, found in family albums. In those days a woman was hired to put the lights in the eyes, color the cheeks and paint the ribbon bows and artificial flowers of the ladies and the gay neckties and button-hole bouquets of the gentlemen. The new photographs, be it a hundred years hence, always will be things of beauty, no matter what evolutions, contractions, or diminutions may befall woman's dress. —New York Sun.

TO MEASURE FOR PAPER.

Rules Which if Followed Makes This a Very Easy Task.

As different paperhangers pursue different methods in hanging paper, so there are various rules and forms for measuring rooms. We therefore append several methods, any of which will bring the desired result.

As most paper when trimmed is eighteen inches wide and twenty-four feet to a single piece, a piece will contain thirty-six square feet.

Measure the length and height of each wall in feet and multiply. Add together the number of square feet of each wall, getting total number of square feet. Divide this total by thirty-six, which will give you the number of pieces required for side wall. Allow one-half piece of paper for each door and window.

To allow for waste in matching it is safer to divide by thirty-three instead of thirty-six.

To find number of single pieces required for ceiling, multiply length by width, in feet, and divide by thirty-three.

A Mental Rule.—Suppose a room to be five yards long by four yards wide, which nets eighteen yards around the room. This is equal to thirty-six half yards or breadths of paper. For each door or window allow two breadths. Our example room having two doors and one window, we allow six breadths, which brings us down to thirty breadths. The room being nine feet high, we divide by five, which gives us a result of six double or twelve single pieces.

For a room seven feet high divide by six. A room eight or nine feet high, divide by five. A room ten or eleven feet high, divide by four.

vesting and early peas will need a "search warrant" to find them.

Mrs. E. A. Benson, Sophiasburgh, is visiting her daughter Mrs. Levi Moore, Napanee.

Miss Nettie Scott, Picton, is spending a few weeks with her sister Mrs. D. B. Cole, Green Point.

Mr. and Mrs. Elias Slater, and Mr. and Mrs. I. B. Tribbs, Yerexville, started from home at 4 o'clock in the morning on Sunday last, and driving to Cressy a distance of some twenty miles arrived at Wm. T. Slater's in time for breakfast. They spent a pleasant day at this most beautiful and romantic spot (McDonnell Cove) and returned home in the evening. "Nothing like Coolican horses" is the unanimous verdict of the party.

The couple who drove to the ferry on Monday last expecting to make their way to Forester Island Park, got badly left and returned home somewhat early in the day, sadder if not wiser than when they started; however it's an ill wind that blows no good, and we have heard considerable talk about a water bicycle since then. Perhaps it has shaken up some new ideas in the region of the inventive bump' in a certain person's head and we shall wake up some morning to find we have a genius in our midst.

DENBIGH.

Rev. Ernest Weber, late of Sterling, Nebraska, U. S. A. arrived here on the 14th inst. and is to take charge of the German Lutheran Mission of this place He preached a very impressive sermon yesterday though his formal induction will not take place till next Sunday on which occasion we hope to have the pleasure of having the last incumbent, the Rev. G. Brackebusch, of Eganville, with us, who has kindly promised to install his successor in the place in which he for nearly seven years so indefatigable laboured. Mr. Weber is a native of Wurtemberg, Germany and expresses himself as being exceedingly well pleased with what he has been able to see of Denbigh and its inhabitants so far.

Mr. Herman Berndt another native of Germany also arrived here on the 14th inst., after some adventures. He intends to pay only a visit to his brother Erdman Berndt one of our citizens, intending to get a Ry. ticket in Liverpool, from Montreal to Kaladar station, he applied for one, but the applied to, seems to have been unpardonably ignorant of the existence of famous station in the Bald Mountains and persuaded Mr. Berndt that there was no such station in Ontario. He succeeded in selling Mr. Berndt a ticket for Callender, Parry Sound district, where the weary daughter, Miss Frank McKim, was united in wedlock with Mr. A. R. Boyce, the popular ... Napanee branch of Stewart's coal yard. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. S. J. Shorey, of Lindsay, in the presence of a number of intimate friends of both the contracting parties. The bride was supported by Miss S. McKim, sister of the bride, while Mr. C. H. Boyce, a brother of the groom, acted as best man. Both the bride and groom are highly respected and esteemed in town and their host of friends will join us in wishing them many happy years of wedded life. The bride has been for a number of years a valued member of the Eastern Methodist church choir. The happy couple took the evening train en route for Cleveland, where they will spend their honeymoon.

In Memoriam.

At her late residence, Wilton, on Friday 14th inst., Eliza Warner, widow of the late Henry Pultz, for many years one of Wilton's most respected citizens. Mrs. Pultz was a daughter of the late Zadoc Warner, of Pennfield, N. Y., and was born at Ballton, Spa., in that same state. At the time of her death she was seventy-nine years of age. She will be missed in the community in which she resided by all, but more especially by those with whom she daily associated. Her illness was not an extended one but frequently during that illness she expressed a willingness to go whenever her heavenly Father saw fit to take her home. For several years prior to her marriage she was an inmate at the home of her cousin, the late Sidney Warner. She was a sister to the late Harvey Warner, of Cold Water, Mich,

Her remains were placed in the cemetery at Wilton by the side of her late husband. Funeral services at her late residence on Sunday, 16th, at 10:30 a. m. —Com.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

To the Editor of the Napanee Express.

An impression having gone abroad that a Sunday excursion train would be run to accommodate the members of the Methodist church and other people to reach the camp meeting at Varty Lake, I will be pleased to have you publicly give notice that no such train has been contemplated though asked for by our Colored Jubilee Methodists. Regular trains will take passengers at reduced rates and the Company will be pleased to make rates for society excursions to the camp meeting grounds. The eloquent colored divine, Dr. Mason, from Washington, D. C., is advertised to be on hand in all his glorious efforts.

Yours truly,
H. B. Sherwood, Supt.

"I Am Permanently Cured."

The Joyful Exclamation of Mr. Alexander Moffatt, of Millbrook, Ont.

Paine's Celery Compound Victorious After the Doctors Failed.

Mr. Moffatt is of the opinion that all his sufferings and troubles had their origin in liver complaint, a terribly dangerous malady that is dragging many a man and woman to the grave. This disease may be acute or chronic. In the acute form, there are violens burning pains conveyed to the shoulder and right arm, short cough, fever, irregular bowels and constipation. In the chronic form of liver complaint, there are many morbid conditions, such as enlargement, softening, abscesses and degeneration. The symptoms are, weight in stomach, flatulence, nausea, bilious vomiting, loss of appetite, thirst, white and dry tongue, bitter taste, and a host of other miserable conditions.

Long experience has fully proved that Paine's Celery Compound is the only medicine that can successfully grapple with the dread disease of liver complaint. Honest and able doctors are advising their patients to make use of Paine's Celery Compound, for the great reason, that they know of no other medicine that gives such prompt and effective results. The cure of Mr. Moffatt amply proves every statement made in favor of Paine's Celery Compound, and clearly demonstrates the fact, that when physicians fail to cure, nature's medicine is sure to do the good work. Mr. Moffatt writes thus:—

"Having been a sufferer for years from severe pains in the side, back and breast, caused, I firmly believe, by a sluggish liver, I received the treatment of eminent physicians, and was compelled to wear a chamois vest, but nothing seemed to do me good.

"At last I was advised by kind friends to try Paine's Celery Compound; and after using six bottles, I find that I am permanently cured. Paine's Celery Compound has indeed done wonders for me. You may publish this for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Valuable treatise and two bottles of medicine sent Free to any Sufferer. Give Express and Post Office address. T. A. SLOCUM CHEMICAL CO., Ltd., Toronto, Ont.

In the case of Boston, Mr. Carter, of the Maverick Oil Co., supplies the sample which he calls "Water White 150 test." "We sell it," he writes, "from tank wagons to the retail grocers at 5½ cents per gallon, and it is sold to families all the way from 7 cents to 10 cents." Turning the American wine gallon into our Imperial gallon, these retail prices mean 8 2-5 to 12 cents a gallon.

To make sure that this oil could be sold in Canada, the two samples were submitted to Mr. Thomas Fox, Inland Revenue office, and, after inspecting them, he gave the following certificate :

Inland Revenue, Canada; Division No. 17
Montreal, December 8, 1892,

Dear Sir,

I have tested the two samples of American refined oils received here on the 6th inst., one from Boston, the other from Rochester, N. Y.

They are first rate oils and stand a test much higher than the Governmental requirement. I am yours truly, Thomas Fox, Inspr., etc.

This means, taking the lowest prices in both places, that coal oil sells at 8½ cents in Boston which can only be got for 28 cents here. The Boston housewife takes three "dimes" out to the door and comes back with three gallons of coal oil in her can, and four cents in her hand. The Montreal housewife takes out three "dimes" and returns with only one gallon of coal oil and two cents. This is the result of the Canadian tariff and kindred governmental restrictions on the importation of petroleum."

The Beaver deals at great length with what Sir Richard Cartwright did, and what it thinks he will do if the Liberals are again returned to power. We again repeat that a 100 per cent duty on coal oil is not consistent with a tariff for revenue only, and so adjusted as to fall on the luxuries and not on the necessaries of life. A 100 per cent duty on coal oil would be no more right eighteen years ago than it is to-day, although to use a stock Tory phrase, it may have been more justifiable to render assistance to the oil industry eighteen years ago "to allow it to become properly established." It was claimed by the designers of the N. P. that it was only a temporary expedient, to allow our "infant industries" to become established, until they were able to walk alone. These "infants" have been feeding at the public's expense for well on to sixteen years, and they are just as greedy, just as needy and just as weak as ever. It has been well pointed out that the present tariff is not adjusted for the purpose of securing the revenue necessary for the economical administration of public affairs in the easiest way for the people, but on the contrary is made the weapon of rings and combines through the operation of which they exclude foreign goods and secure the power to charge exorbitant prices for their own wares. The N. P. has snuffed out all the small manufacturing industries that flourished prior to its introduction, and the business that they did has become centralized in concerns like the Massey Harris Co. It is unnecessary to go outside of Napanee for an illustration of this.

The Beaver's statement that during the past few years sugar has been admitted in free, is quite in line with its usual standard of arguments. For whose benefit was it admitted in free? Was it for the benefit of the Canadian consumer? Raw sugar up to a few weeks ago was admitted into Canada free of duty for the benefit of the Canadian refiner, and for his benefit solely. Beet root sugar not above 14 Dutch standard was also admitted free, but on refined sugar a duty was imposed. The Tory Government's manipulation of the sugar business has allowed a few men to amass great wealth, but in no way has it benefited the Canadian consumer. It has enabled Mr. Redpath, the great Canadian sugar refiner, to amass a fortune, and retire to the old country with it, where he lives in a style that would bankrupt an ordinary prince. Protection is no more nor less than legalized robbery. The Beaver may see much to commend in a system that allows a few men to amass wealth at the expense of the great body of consumers, and its elation over the fact that for the past few years sugar (raw, and not above 14 Dutch standard) was admitted free is great evidence of its "profundity" and "wisdom." The Tory Government did not lessen the sugar duties until they were forced to do it, because the American Government abolished them altogether. For several years a bounty equivalent to nearly 2 cents a pound was granted to the sugar industry in Canada, and according to the present regulations it receives aid to the extent of one and a half cents per pound. Our contemporary's other statements are equally in line with its assertions in this respect. This great deficit making N. P. is so arranged that of the $60,000,000 actual taxation taken out of the pockets of the people per year only $20,000,000 goes into the treasury of the Dominion. This was ably demonstrated by Sir Richard Cartwright in his speech on the Budget debate.

The Beaver has dealt at great length on the dire results that would occur to the people of Canada if they had not the protecting care of the N. P. and the Canadian coal oil monopoly to save them from the

ABOUT CHATTELLE THE CRIMINAL.

BATH, JUNE 10th.

While agreeing with what I consider to be the animating spirit of Mr. Pringle's article on the above subject, namely that science should do its best with all its resources for the amelioration of society by the betterment of the individual human being, physical mental, moral, spiritual and phrenological; and while agreeing with some of his suggestions and differing from others, allow me to point out one conspicuous omission, which is an indispensible consideration in this matter, namely, the power of habit. No one becomes a great criminal on the spur of the moment, impelled by a strong uncontrollable rush and surge of overmastering impulse which he has never felt before, and which places him completely and slavishly and helplessly in the power of his passion as a result of his cranial development. The beginning of these things are small and early in the childhood, at a time and in a mode in which they can be easily conquered and restrained within proper and normal limits. "Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it." In childhood (either early or late as the case may be) fear may easily be inspired in order to act as a deterrent from doing wrong (that is one use of pain, to inspire dread of going in a course that incurs pain.) While if the person, the subject of discipline, is left too long, fear may cease to have any power to decide his action; and he may accustom himself to shut out fear from having any place in the decision of his will, or resolution. As a common ordinary example of this, any one who will remember the high-spirited breed of horses that we had about here in this part of the country a few years ago, will recall the fact that they could be easily and successfully trained while very young, but if they were left until they were grown, then once get their high-strung temper up, no amount of fear had any effect in forcing them to act in any stated way. So it is often a fad with some people, and used to be countenanced greatly by a certain style of literature, that a manly person doesn't and shouldn't know what fear is, nor allow it to have any effect at all on his course of conduct; while the ordinary well-conducted citizen has and always has had a wholesome fear of several things, such as a fear of good and right public opinion, a fear of disgrace, a fear of getting into dark solitary confinement in jail, or a fear of losing his liberty in the penetentiary, or losing his life or happiness or health, &c., or a fear of offending too greatly or grievously or outrageously, the Deity, the establisher of the right moral order, and sanctioner of the perception of right and wrong.

First let the parent or trainer of the child force the child's passions or wishes or emotions to keep within the correct bounds until the child can himself acquire the power of restraint and control. Then let him be instructed in the laws that society and public opinion and the state and religion impose as laying down the limits beyond which his passions and instincts and wishes will not be allowed to transgress; while still letting him understand that within these limits and conditions, the gratification of his feelings and wishes is allowable, not only so, but right and good and commendable. Such a person, with habitual self-control, and who daily and commonly, according to the most approved methods taught by religion and science, weeds out from himself the first beginnings of wrong impelling passions that threaten to ingulf his nature and defy the mastery of reason; such a person will and can never become a criminal.

I think that, to a certain extent Mr.

responsible very much for his crime, and for his careless and cheap estimate of life; for when a person is used to seeing thousands killed for no particular reason that he can make out, why, the taking of one life seems to be almost a trifle; so that after all, Canada is probably not responsible for Chattelle. But still, although our country relegates to the parents and the churches the office of instructing the youth in the primary regulations, laws rules and principles of right legal social moral and personal conduct; it is plain and patent to the careful observer that the instruction thus given is often imperfect or defective or one-sided, and has not (even in its best exercise, which is very rare) that broad symmetrical thorough and well-balanced character that the advancement of the finishing nineteenth century should warrant. It is true that the sciences of ethics and political economy are taught in the universities, but in this case only a few are benefitted. But it is really the duty of the state to teach them to all its youth, and this could be done by making a small primary compendium containing all the general rules and principles that the proper political and social order demands; all these being stated in simple language and form, without going into the discussion of the abstruse fundamental theories that the philosopy of the subject would busy itself with. This is the method of procedure with all the subjects taught in the public schools. Results generally are given, while the abstruse philosophy that originally elaborated these results is not touched upon. And surely a congress, of our most celebrated thinkers, statesmen, philanthropists and christian leaders, could agree on the great ordinary rules of correct ethical, social, political and legal conduct, and the great general principles sanctioning these rules. As it is, the children of the public schools have no definite scientific practical instruction at all on these points, while they have the most careful and authoritative instruction on every other; so that the effect is to relegate all the thoughts and views about conduct and character to an extremely secondary and obscure place in their minds, compared with arithmetic, literature, and science generally.

It just occurs to me to say that no amount of fine cranial development or of almost any other kind of development could long withstand the bad pernicious immoral and dissipating influence of that one anarchic idea above referred to, "do as you please," which in so many forms is so potent and prevalent at the present time and this fact goes to show the supreme influence of an idea in shaping human action, and therefore the supreme importance of having just and correct ideas about what to do and what to avoid doing, and why thus to do and thus to avoid doing. I speak of this anarchic idea, because Chattelle's dictum that "it was for the best" is evidently the prompting of the idea that the best good in life is "to do as you please," which idea directly and radically nullifies all self-control and self regulation, and makes moral power a nullity— that is one wrong idea can make a man a moral idiot (to employ Mr. Pringle's phrase); for it puts the shaping of one's action, not in the hands of reason, but in the direction of what happens to be pleasing at the time.

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, JUNE 21, 1895.

SOME MISSTATEMENTS EXPOSED.

As remarked by an esteemed contemporary, the Montreal Herald, we believe, it has become quite a common practice for Tory newspapers to answer one issue by raising and putting forward another and a false issue. Our local contemporary, the Napanee Beaver, contained an article last week about a column and a half in length, purporting to be an answer to THE EXPRESS on the coal oil question. By raising issues totally irrelevant to the subject, by innuendo, personalities, and false insinuations our contemporary endeavors to shirk the subject at issue, and in almost every line its author gives evidence of his "Pecksniffism." To those who have had an opportunity of seeing both sides as actually presented these exhibitions put our contemporary in a bad light, but it is willing to undergo that in the gratification it feels that it got ahead of us with the few whose source of information is limited to the murky light of its dark lantern.

In its issue of April 26th the Beaver published an article entitled "Protection on Coal Oil," in which it referred to the alarming frequency of coal oil lamp explosions in Canada, the number of persons thus burned to death, and the many homes and valuable property thus destroyed. These explosions it averred were due almost entirely to cheap American coal oil. It made this statement in the face of the fact that there is a high Canadian fire test on coal oil—HIGHER FOR THE AMERICAN PRODUCT THAN OUR OWN. We effectually exposed the Beaver's misstatement re the dangerous quality of American coal oil, and demonstrated, what is well-known, that it is not only safer, but cleaner and better than Canadian coal oil. We also asserted that the Beaver had no more knowledge of the brand of oil used by the late Mrs. Tovell, of Toronto Junction, "whose clothing," it avers, "was so badly burned because of the lamp explosion of American oil" that she "died in the hospital next week," than the man in the moon, and this assertion it did not attempt to contradict.

The Beaver meets our statement that American coal oil is being retailed in the border cities of the United States for 8 and 10 cents a gallon, by saying it is only the cheap and nasty stuff that is being sold for that, "but any statement that a first class oil is being sold for that is simply false." This is the same species of "argument" as was indulged in in 1892. The Montreal Star, an independent newspaper, like THE EXPRESS, investigated the matter at that time and this is what it said:

"Some time ago we stated that good coal oil, such as we import here, was sold in Portland at the rate of twelve cents an Imperial Canadian gallon; a similiar oil being sold here for twenty-eight cents. Some doubt arose as to the ability of this American oil to pass our high Canadian fire test—higher for the American product than our own—which led a Montreal importer to test the question by obtaining samples of the oil sold in the American cities and to submit them to our Inland Revenue inspectors. The samples were obtained from the cities of Rochester and Boston.

From Rochester, the wholesale dealer supplying the sample, Mr. Everest, of the Vacuum Oil Co., writes that the sample is "the better quality coal oil sold in this market." It is delivered from tank wagons to retail grocers at 4½ cents a wine gallon and is retailed from house to house by peddlers at 8 and 10 cents per wine gallon. Translated into Imperial gallons, these latter figures machinations of the Standard Oil Co. and kindred monopolies in the United States. It speaks of the absurdity of accusing the Canadian oil producers of "heartlessness" in raising their prices in sympathy with the rise in prices in the United States. What THE EXPRESS really did say was that the Beaver was very harsh on the Standard Oil Co., characterizing it as one of the most unmerciful of all American monopolies, but it has nothing but kind words for our own coal oil monopolists who are every bit as unmerciful. Wherein are the people of Canada protected from the machinations of the Standard Oil Co. when our oil men follow where they lead. The price of coal oil here went up purely in sympathy with the machinations of the aforesaid Standard Oil Co., and we make this statement and take the risk of again having hurled at us from the Beaver pen such "gaul dipped" powerful arguments as the following from its last week's issue: "usual profundity," "make himself so ridiculous," "pitiable ignorance," "stupidity" and several other choice epithets from its extensive vocabulary. In conclusion, it informs us in its own offensive patronizing way that "THE EXPRESS has brought all this exposure of its own stupidity and ignorance on its own shoulders" and that for it waded in beyond its depth. The Beaver in this statement gives an exhibition of overweening conceit, distasteful at any time, but when thus paraded publicly it becomes nauseating. THE EXPRESS welcomes such "exposures," and we may state that the people of this county did not show their appreciation of the N. P. at last general election, the Beaver notwithstanding to the contrary.

We have no desire to enter into a mud slinging contest with our contemporary, but we hardly feel inclined to allow the misstatements and falsehoods contained in its last issue to go uncontradicted. The malevolence displayed, and the manner in which it goes out of its way to attack and abuse the editor of this paper is a fair sample of the course the editor of the Beaver has pursued towards THE EXPRESS privately. We regret that we are forced to speak this way, but the Beaver instituted it, and although, perhaps, it would be better to treat its slander with the silent contempt that it deserves, we do not propose to do that. Of the editorial matter in THE EXPRESS it is only necessary to say that the fact that we have won the Beaver's animosity is a strong enough recommendation. When it devotes its editorial columns to belittle and abuse us we take it that no further commendation is needed. THE EXPRESS has always endeavored to conform with the amenities of journalism, and in dealing with our exchanges we have endeavored, whenever practicable, to give due credit for any item used. We are always on the lookout to get the very best going for our readers, and we are pleased to say that our efforts are appreciated by them. Re the Beaver's claim about "original matter," we will leave that with the intelligent readers of our paper to judge. But for the benefit of those who do not take THE EXPRESS we will make this proposition to our contemporary, and if it will comply with it we will be willing to let the matter rest there. Let the Beaver send a representative over to this office and we will show it a local item in THE EXPRESS, let it then refer to its issue of two weeks later, and it will find the same item with fourteen words carefully eliminated. Let it then publish the two articles in parallel, putting the date on which it appeared in each paper above them, and its readers will then have an opportunity of judging how its claim of "originality" is sustained. The Beaver advises us to use the scissors. It is quite consistent in giving this advice for its news columns have been supplied almost exclusively for a great number of years by the free and indiscriminate use of the scissors. Ex-compositors of that office tell stories of how they have "set" type there from Monday morning until Thursday night and the only copy put before their weary eyes was reprint from other papers. The larger portion of its local and county news is made up of clippings from exchanges. We may state in conclusion that we have never yet seen an "original item" in the Beaver worth copying.

Pringle is to be commended for drawing attention to the case. The old barbarous idea that ignorance of the law is no excuse for the person transgressing it, should no longer have any force with parents and trainers, and church teachers and with state teachers. The state wishes to have good citizens, let it teach its children the ordinary elemental laws and rules of proper legal conduct, also the simple principles of social order; do not leave the youth to form his ideas from the wild anarchic theories that are floating around through the cities. That wild theory that it is right and good and the best thing to "do as you please" always, which is the note of anarchism: what fearful power that has to break down all proper and legal restraint. And no doubt Chattelle had imbibed that idea in his travels over the world as a sailor and miner. No doubt also, since the libertine notions of soldiers and armies is or are proverbial; Chattelle's life as a soldier in the rebellion in the states is

MODERN PROGRESS.

Another device for adapting the gas engine to the running of vehicles on ordinary roads is spoken of with commendation as a mechanical triumph by the scientific press. It is a tricycle mechanism, propelled by a two-horse power balanced gas engine, and, having been tested on various city streets under varying conditions of grade and roadway, is said to have proved in every instance satisfactory, being of easy control as regards starting, the regulation of speed, turning, stopping, etc. The machine is calculated to carry three persons on a single broad seat, though operated by one, with surplus power sufficient to trail one or two buggies or a loaded waggon, according to the character or condition of the road. It carries 12 hours' supply of gasoline, or two and one-half gallons, and easily attains a speed of from, say, 10 to 12 miles per hour on fairly favorable ground, and, being geared in such a manner that the movement of a lever increases or decreases the speed, enables the driver to climb grades of considerable pitch. It is claimed to be perfectly safe, is very simple in construction, the entire device being strong enough to withstand hard usage.

Why Gold Exists.

Before the Royal Society of New South Wales, a member recently presented a summary of the various reasons which have been put forth to account for the existence of alluvial gold other than the old and accepted one, that it has been set free by processes of disintegration. Details are also given of a large number of experiments made with a view to determine whether a nucleus of gold, immersed in a gold solution and in the presence of such substances as would be likely to occur in nature, will increase in weight, the conclusion being that gold is deposited when the nucleus is in contact not only with metalliferous sulphides and arsenides which form strong galvanic couples, but also with such substances as iron oxides, charcoal, graphite, sandstone, granite, quartz, clay and marble, which form but weak galvanic couples with the gold nucleus. It is doubtful he thinks, whether the common assertion as to the greater fineness of nugget as compared with coarse vein gold has any foundation in fact; with fine alluvial Making Dry Walks.

The accompanying sketch shows the proper way of making a dry walk about one's premises. The darker shading shows where a trench has been dug, at the bottom of which is laid a line of tile. The earth is then shoveled back into the trench, after the joints of the tile have been carefully covered with hay to prevent the loose earth from getting into the joints before it has become firmly packed together, some eighteen inches at the top being left open. A foot of cobble or broken stones is then placed upon the earth and well packed down; over this is spread six inches of gravel, slightly rounded from side to side. The gravel, and the rocks beneath, cause all water falling upon the surface to at once disappear, while very soon small channels will be formed, leading down through the earth to the tile drain. Not only will the walk be thoroughly drained in this way, but no small amount of land upon either side as well. One can thus by a little planning arrange his paths so that they may coincide with the lines where underdrains are needed for the benefit of the land. Drains under the middle of the driveway, and under some of the principal walks, may thus be made to serve a double and most useful purpose. If gravel upon the surface of a path seems too coarse and harsh for the feet, a little clay can be mixed with it, the whole making a very good and somewhat porous surface, though to secure the quickest withdrawal of surface water it is advisable to leave the borders of the walk wholly of gravel.

is thought to result from the removal of silver and other impurities by solution, owing to the larger relative surfaces exposed. Furthermore, the author assumes that large nuggets could be artificially produced by methods used in his own experiments, and that gold is probably being so deposited at the present day.

Incinerating Garbage.

Experiments have lately been made in New York with a view to developing a means of incinerating garbage. That the device is effective for the destruction of scraps and, in fact, of everything save metal and ashes, there is little doubt. The furnace, which was built in a roofless enclosure near the East River, is simple in construction and inexpensive. There is no perceptible odor about the place, and the chimney gives out gas rather than smoke. The only time when persons standing within 50 feet of the furnace were made aware of the character of the contents was when an iron hood that covers the top of the structure was lifted and a new supply of scraps shoveled into the flames. Even this Richard A. Healy, the engineer and originator of the contrivance, promises will be overcome by a draught pipe, to be run down from the top of the furnace to the flue, through which a central coal flame consumes the smoke from other divisions of the furnace. Other furnaces similar to this one will be built more elaborately, of fire brick and steel instead of iron. Then will be considered the possibilities of securing power from the furnace, which generates intense heat, and which could be readily utilized. By disposing of this power the economy of this method of destroying street scraps would be very materially increased, so that the sweepings of New York could be destroyed by fire, and even a profit secured to the contractor who does the work.

Air as a Timber Preservative.

Probably no better illustration can be had even at the present time, of the great importance of free access of air to woodwork as a means of protection against premature decay, than the results of an investigation, conducted a few years ago, into the causes of an accident in an expensive apartment house in one of the principal cities of the United States, in which a portion of one of the upper floors gave way, and, in falling, carried along corresponding sections of the several floors below, landing the whole mass of wreckage in the cellar. It was found that a fortunately unusual system of floor construction had been adopted in the building in question, the spaces between the wooden beams having been filled with ashes, presumably with the view of making a comparative fireproof structure. Whatever its merits in this respect may have been, there was no question whatever that the mixture of ashes formed a most efficient barrier against the access of air to the timbers, and any moisture that was inherently in them or afterward found its way to them through the tiling above, had little opportunity of being carried ayay by any ventilating air currents. The beams simply had to rot, and that comparatively quickly. In the subsequent work of reconstruction of the floors, however, good care was taken that they should not again suffer in the same way.

Mill architects generally appreciate the preserving influence of free air circulation so thoroughly that they carefully guard against even the painting of any floor beams which are open to the suspicion of imperfect seasoning. Where any moisture is still present in the wood a coat of paint or tar or anything else impervious to air, ordinarily looked upon as a protective agent, simple prevents this moisture from escaping, and thus, instead of guarding against rapid decay, really promotes it to a very material degree. Happily this circumtance is becoming properly recognized and is beginning to receive a due share of attention.—Cassier's Magazine.

STOP WEARING A TRUSS

She was a very proud girl—quite a stand-offish sort of a girl—and she came on board with a fixed intention not to speak to anybody. I noticed her while we were yet in the dock at Tilbury. You don't notice individuals as a rule, for everybody looks so like everybody else on a first meeting, especially when it is almost dark and a crowd of passengers hang about the ship's side, taking their last look at things ashore. But I noticed this lady at the very first. I was on deck, prepared to go with the steamship Atalanta to New York city, and I saw her alight from the train some hundred yards distant. I lost her until she stepped upon the gangway, and then I was confirmed in my impression that she was a remarkably handsome girl.

She came on board like a princess, and for some minutes disappeared. Presently I felt a strange sensation. She was positively standing beside me. There was no reason why she should have preferred any other locality, but the fact that she came and stood by the side of me certainly deepened the extraordinary impression she had made. Without presuming to stare at her, I got a glimpse of her fine profile and dark, haughty eyes.

The usual scenes were going on about us. I ventured a remark—foolish and trifling, no doubt—but hardly deserving the contemptuous silence with which it was received.

The last bell sounded, the gangway was withdrawn and we began to haul out of dock; but still she stood there and made no sign. I plucked up spirit and asked her if she was going to America—an absurd question, seeing that America was the sole destination of the ship. She turned and looked at me, said nothing and walked away.

It was a lovely night, and as we dropped down the river the passengers stood about in groups and enjoyed it. Several spoke to me and became quite sociable. She was on deck also until 11 o'clock, but sitting alone, and, so far as I could tell, making no comment upon the mystery of shadows sparkling with lights afloat and ashore which the vessel glided past.

I kept at a respectable distance; but I saw the captain speak to her, and I'm sure he got subdued for his audacity; so I put it down to pride. I think she made an exception of the stewardess—in fact, I am sure she did—later on. There is a winning a good deal and the saloon banquets were better patronized. I returned to the deck after a capital luncheon, with one of Clark Russell's stories under my arm; and I filled my big pipe and meandered in the direction of my chair, intending to enjoy myself thoroughly. Imagine my rage when I found the chair absolutely gone? I rushed up and down the deck until I observed that everybody was bursting with laughter.

Suddenly, under the lee of the captain's cabin I came upon Millicent Bradley. Her proud gray eyes were dim and lusterless, the full, firm contour of the face was gone, and her rich complexion had changed to putty color. The self reliant mouth sank at the corners, and was partly open, as if she lacked the vital energy to press her pallid lips together.

As I stepped before her and stared with astonishment and distress, she opened her eyelids just another sixteenth of an inch and murmured in the most die away tone: "Oh, Mr. Franklin, I'm afraid I've got your chair. Do take it! Please take it!"

Of course I was instantly at her side, imploring her to keep the blessed chair forever, to wear it for my sake—not that she showed the slightest disposition to give it up.

For three days I waited upon her hand and foot, helped her with delicacies, told her funny stories—not about seasickness—recited poetry to her—my own, unpublished!—and—yes, I flirted with her.

And she? Oh, it did her good—brightened her up amazingly. She talked better than a phonograph and we were all in all to each other. The doctor was a bit of a nuisance, presuming upon his medical privileges, you understand, and the captain pestered us; but I got my grip, as we used to say when I rowed in the college eight, and I pulled right through, giving them my "wash" all the time.

And so we drew nearer to Sandy Hook, and although I had to sit upon a campstool while I watched over her in my lawful capacity of landlord of the deck chair, I never enjoyed crossing so much in my life, and I've been over the Atlantic about twenty times on business.

But within a day's sail of New York a disaster fell upon the ship, so terrifying, so lurid, so indescribably horrible, that you will think me inconsistent in declaring that it increased my happiness a hundredfold and gave me in one hideous moment all the concentrated joy of a lifetime.

It had come on to blow again. A great bank of bubbling, purple clouds had arisen in the northwest as the night closed in, and while I was helping Miss Bradley down the companionway, driven from the deck by the ugly, threatening aspect of the sky, a blast of wind struck the vessel, heeling her over with a suddenness that forced me to cling with all my might to the banister, and Miss Bradley, with all hers, to my neck. For nearly a minute my chin reposed against the top of her head, but that ecstasy was vouchsafed to me no longer.

"LIFTING THE ALMOST FAINTING GIRL IN BOTH MY ARMS."

surely be jesting—making light of it in panic-stricken bravado, else why was she so unmistakably overmastered by fear? Her face was set like marble, her eyes glared to right and left; her beautifully chiseled nostrils sniffed the down draught from the engine room.

As we stood there in the darkness, clinging to the side of the cabin and to each other she asked: "Are you sure there is nothing wrong with the ship—nothing?"

Her tone was so changed that I stared at her for a moment through the smother before asking the counter question: "What should there be?"

"What is this smoke?" she whispered hoarsely in my ear. Before I could answer there was a concussion above as if the very heaven had fallen upon the ship, and we were both dashed off our feet. I fell with my hand upon some metal work which the carpet did not cover. It was so hot it almost blistered me. I quickly scrambled up, and, lifting the almost fainting girl in both my arms, staggered with her to a cushioned nook close by. As I did so there came a rush of water into the saloon, sweeping over the floor, in waves as the oscillation of the vessel flung it from one side to the other; and as the flood receded to mass itself in another quarter, a cloud of steam arose, adding to the denseness of the prevailing gloom.

"Save me, Horace!" gasped Millicent—in that moment she called me by that name—"Save me, Horace, for the love of heaven?" I caught her to my breast like a child—she was a very full grown woman, and must have weighed eleven stone—I kissed her cheek, her eyes, her lips, and she never murmured. I strode with unwavering steps to the companionway with that lovely burden soft and supple in my arms. I sprang up the steps with a confidence I had not possessed in the calmest of weather, and presently stood with her on deck, the wind tearing at us like a legion of devils, and the rushing masses of water dashing over us from head to foot. It would have been too much for me, exposed to the full force of it, had not a handy charm about the stewardess to which most ladies yield when a ship gets out to sea.

The next morning Miss Bradley (for that, as I discovered afterward, was her name) and I met at breakfast. I think all the passengers met at breakfast—at that first breakfast. She was there anyway, and fortune seated her at my elbow. I made some progress with Miss Bradley in furnishing her plate. Oh, she was all right at that first breakfast. The sea was like glass and the sweet morning air in the channel was very appetizing.

But the neighborly chat with which I tried to garnish the eggs and bacon met with little encouragement, and she committed herself no more than to the indorsement of my hope that we should have this sort of thing all the way. By "this sort of thing" I meant the glorious weather, not her monumental frigidity; but I don't think she took the trouble to analyze my conceptions.

All that day she wandered about the deck, with her dark eyes—they were dark gray in the sunshine—surveying the panorama of the chill belted southern coast, or sat upon a bench by the saloon dome, reading a book under the shadow of the awning which had been rigged up on the "promenade." The splendid lines of her figure showed to advantage in a neat gown of homespun. No one spoke to her, and she spoke to nobody. At dinner I got a trifle forward by the aid of baked potatoes, but nothing to boast of.

There were several jolly women among the passengers; and particularly jolly they were on the score of the calm sea. Our time in the channel was as good as a picnic, and it seemed as if the prevailing merriment must tantalize Miss Bradley out of her proud reserve. But it didn't.

The next morning when the steward called me at half past six o'clock for my bath, a breeze had sprung up, and the ship was lifting and rolling in it considerably. The breakfast table was but thinly attended. Miss Bradley, however, came in and took her place beside me. Come, I thought, she is a good sailor. I'll amuse her with some anecdotes about those who are sick at sea.

I supplied her plate, and launched into a funny story. To my dismay, she suddenly arose and left the table—likewise the saloon, ramming her handkerchief into her mouth, as I assumed, to prevent the laughter which must unbend her dignity, and break down the icy barrier between us.

For five days her pride—or some other indisposition—buried her in the sacred seclusion of her stateroom. It was too bad! During those five days we staggered through a lively cross sea, which made walking on deck a very awkward business, and I spent most of my time reclining in my comfortable deck chair.

It now occurred to a number of passengers that a deck chair was the thing of all others which they ought to have brought on board. The scanty accommodation of benches was inadequate for those who wanted to lie down at full length and "sleep it off," and the deck was not only non-sybaritic, but offered indifferent anchorage; those who made their bed on the floor experienced a constant tendency to slip and slide and roll as the Atalanta wrestled with the waves. It would not do.

Furious glances were cast at my snug chair, which I had moored in a sheltered corner. Piratical attacks were made upon that chair whenever I ventured to quit it for a moment. If I took a turn to stretch my limbs, or went below for a book or an extra rug, I never failed to find on my return some interloping loafer ensconced in my nest and pretending to be fast asleep, I stood a good deal of this, and in a noble transport of self sacrifice wandered about like a lost dog. But I wouldn't stand it any longer. And I didn't.

I began to evict the intruders; at first with great delicacy: "Pray excuse me. I fancy you have mistaken your chair." Then with less compunction: "I regret that I must disturb you; I am not feeling very well." And later without ceremony or remorse: "Now, sir, my chair, if you please!"

It came to this, that I got quite "rusty," and acquired the habit of folding up my chair whenever I left it, affixing thereon a notice: "This chair was brought on board for the owner's use. All others keep away." This manifesto brought upon me a great deal of chaff. A petition was got up, requesting me to "take the chair" at a meeting to be held for the purpose of denouncing monopolies. A band of young fools serenaded me with a chorus of "Chair, boys! Chair! He'll sleep until to-morrow!" And there were other attempts at fun almost as feeble. They kept this up so persistently that, being out of sorts through the rough weather, and also on account of the prolonged absence of the girl with the dark gray eyes, I became as surly as a bear.

On the sixth day the sea had gone down

As the ship righted Millicent parted from me, sprang down the few remaining stairs, grabbed at the hand rail and whisked away to her cabin sans adieux.

I struggled back to the deck for the rugs and cushions and found the vessel enveloped in a furious storm. Already it was dark, and the Atalanta was plunging like a restive horse, the sea coming in floods over the bulwarks and the wind tearing and shrieking among the cordage and blustering against the big roaring funnel. The rain came down in slanting sheets of water and the sailors were shouting to each other and warning the passengers who had delayed getting below. I lost one of my rugs, and how I saved my life I can hardly tell. My deck chair I left strapped to its moorings and took refuge in the smoke rooms with half a dozen other white faced sailors.

With the greatest difficulty we got to our staterooms and I clambered into my berth, simply shedding my top coat on the floor and kicking off my sopping shoes, I lay on my back with my elbows wedged against the side of the bunk to prevent myself being pitched out by the violent rolling of the ship, and listened to the smashing of glass and crockery and the crash of hat boxes, bags and other unsecured trifles, which were flying about like pips in a dice box, and to the shuddering whirl of the screw as the water dropped away from our stern and left the great flanges to beat the air. The steward came and put the lights out, a red tape proceeding which added to the awfulness of things in general. Then I began to get unsufferably warm. It was summer time and with portholes closed the atmosphere below decks was almost stuffy; but never before had I felt such an oppression. I concluded that we had gone into the gulf stream, or something of that sort, and they had closed all the ventilators for the sake of keeping the ship watertight.

I had to lie there in a bath of perspiration, for I could not get relief by taking off my clothes. To unwedge myself in order to make the attempt would have resulted in my rolling out on to the floor, where my shoes and a water bottle and a careless companion's razor case were having a perfect frolic together.

I grew parched with thirst. Every moment the air became more unbreathable. Ten minutes more and I gasped aloud: "I must get out of this or die!" I flung myself down, taking my chance of the razors, and groped out of the door. A stifling fog hung in the saloon. The dim light of the swinging lantern showed it to me. Peering about me with almost blinded eyes I perceived that from every stateroom abutting on the saloon one or more passengers had crept out like myself and were standing at each opening like specters, holding on desperately to anything. The saloon seemed to be doing its best to subvert itself. At times the floor was almost perpendicular. Now I was lying flat upon the outer wall of my cabin; the next instant I was hanging from the rail that ran around it, as if I were a trapeze performer. All about there was a pandemonium of tumbling things. The sea thundered against the vessel fearfully, and again and again there was that horrible shudder of the screw.

Near me clung an old gentleman in night attire. "A nice thing, this!" he bellowed in my ear. To save discussion, I agreed with him that it was very nice indeed.

Across the saloon was the cabin dedicated to Miss Bradley. I detected a ghostly figure there and made my way over, holding fast to the chairs and the table. Yes, it was she, white as the dressing gown that swathed her graceful figure. She grasped my hand. Her dark eyes gazed into my face with a terrible expression.

"Thank God, you have come to me!" she cried with passionate earnestness.

We had grown very good friends during those few blissful days of her convalescence, but only by maintaining a rigid barrier of the most respectful ceremony. How I blessed the accommodating tempest which made her now speak to me like that!

I kept her hand in mine and brought my face close to hers—I had to do this to make my consolation intelligible, there was such a racket. "It's all right!" I shouted. "Only a gale of wind. Bit of a sea on. You're quite right to turn out if you feel nervous."

She shook her head. "Oh, the storm is nothing," she replied.

"Nothing at all!" I assented, scoffingly, as if I had been used to "high seas and howling winds" from infancy. But in my heart I did not agree with her. She must sailor coiled a rope about us and hitched us on securely. He bound us heart to heart, and I stood with her so through the flying hours that dragged so tediously with most people. There and then and thus I told my love to her—and she listened to me. She made me swear that if the ship's company had to take to the boats I would go with her. If that could not be she begged me to let her stay and drown with me.

Oh, what a glorious time that was; with the storm beating me almost senseless, the ship a furnace beneath my feet. The utter hoplessness of boats living in such a sea, should the fire break through the battened down hatches and drive us from the vessel.

The last shock had evoked a wail of alarm from the surrounding cabins, and the saloon became crowded with people rushing out of their doors. But when they found the floor surging with water and that white vapor floating upward, there was a perfect shriek of dismay: "The boilers have burst! The boilers!"

Supposing the water to be scalding I instinctively placed Millicent Bradley at full length upon the couch. There was no time to save myself, and I let out an unmanly yell as the waves lapped me right up to the knee. It seemed to bite the flesh from my bones. I can stand pain—I used to play foot ball in England—but you just put your stockinged feet in boiling water and try that! In a jiffy I was perched upon the top of a small table, and clapped my hands to my injured extremities, but, strange to say, I was not scalded at all. The water was cold. Others found this out simultaneously. And yet the steam was rising.

The meaning of it flashed upon Millicent first of all—or, perhaps, this phenomenon only confirmed a fear—"God help us;" she cried; "the vessel is on fire."

The words flew like lightning. All rushed pell mell out of the saloon and up the stairs to the deck.

Never shall I forget the dawn of that day; the clouds glaring spitefully as they fled away before the sun; the waves cowering into sullenness; the storm wind screeching in baffled passion—and my deck chair gone!

They had found the fire and extinguished it; and with the morning light came the cry of "Land ahead!" from the lookout.

We should get through it all safely, then; and beyond lay—paradise! Not the same paradise that we had contemplated in the dark hours, but still paradise; such a one as I would be contented with for all the rest of my life.

* * * * *

A pilot joined us. We steamed into Sandy Hook. They steered the battered hulk of the Atalanta into the grand harbor of New York under as goodly a sun as ever smiled on lovers.

Millicent Bradley once again stood by my side and spoke no word. Her dark eyes surveyed the shore and took stock of the monster excursion steamers, the Statue of Liberty and the Brooklyn Bridge; but she made no comment. She had not referred to that sweet night of terrors since I found her standing on the promenade deck neatly dressed for going ashore.

We passed the Battery and drew near to the company's landing stage. Presently we were being hauled into the dock. In five minutes the gangways would be run up, and we should have to go ashore. And up to this time, although I had told her all about myself, my family, my position and my prospects in life, all unimpeachable, she had not confided to me any of her own affairs, not even her destination. But now she turned to me and looked me squarely in the eye. "You were very kind to me last night, Mr Franklin," she said, in tones that I fancied trembled a little.

"Mister!" I stammered, aghast at her coldness.

"I am very grateful—I shall always be. Don't think badly of me for being so weak and foolish. I could not bear"—she hesitated, and shook back a tear that seemed about to sparkle in her eye as she corrected herself: "I should not like you to—to despise me."

"Oh, Miss—Millicent!" I began.

But she went on firmly: "Of course, we must not take seriously anything which circumstances—so exceptional—so very, very dreadful, indeed—we must not bind ourselves by what such circumstances forced upon us. We will say 'good-bye' now; and—and if—if we never meet again——"

"Millicent!" I cried, catching both her hands, quite heedless of onlookers, "don't coquet with me after what we have both gone through! You can say calmly to me, 'If we ever meet again;' I say to you, 'Must we ever, ever part?'"

THE NIGHT-BLOOMING CACTUS.

A Gigantic and Beautiful Bloom Which Flourishes at Los Angeles.

A flower grown out of doors the year round surpasses one which has to spend half its year in an artificially heated room with little sunshine and less oxygen. The superiority of California flowers is no miracle and no accident, but the logical and inevitable result of more favorable surroundings.

The night-bloom cereus is a plant much admired by amateurs in the East, where it is blooming as a social as well as botanical event. It is needless to say, however, that an Eastrn invitation to come and see our cereus bloom means an indoor affair. But it is not so here. Cereus triangularis is one of the most showy of the night-blooming cacti. The branches are triangular, very thick and heavy, with few short spines. Outside, it grows to immense proportions. If planted near a dwelling its great branches flatten themselves against the side of the house, sending out long, pale yellow, adventurous roots on either side, which attach themselves tightly to the wood, until the stems become hardened, when they loosen, tury gray and hang like fringes of string. Plants bloom from cuttings in a few months. The time of blooming is from July until November.

The buds are at first like rough balls. As they increase in size they develop into a gorgeous flower, with a scaly and pale green stem. They begin to open at about 5 o'clock in the evening, and close at 10 in the morning—except on foggy days, when they remain open until the sun comes out. The flowers measure from nine to twelve inches from tip to tip of petals, and twelve inches in length. The sepals are greenish yellow, the broad inner petals fine creamy white, like satin. The stamens lie in the centre like a skein of silken floss, their creamy anthers surrounding a magnificent large, light yellow velvet pistil.

In this country the plants gives no seed unless the flowers are fertilized by hand. When this is done it bears a splendid large fruit of a beautiful deep

BEAUTY ON THE BENCH.

A Pretty Girl Once Sat With California's Supreme Court.

"Few People are aware that a woman once sat on the Supreme bench in California," said ex-Secretary of State Thomas Beck. A look of incredulity overspread the features of his listeners.

"It's a fact, nevertheless," continued Mr. Beck. "It was in—Well, never mind the year, but I was then secretary of state and court was being held in Sacramento. Judge Wallace was on the bench and among those in the capital city during the session was Col. Shafter and a number of his officers. The colonel was accompanied by his daughter, a very young, bright and handsome miss.

"One morning at the breakfast table in the Golden Eagle Hotel, Justice Wallace said: 'Miss Shatter, I feel quite slighted. Since you have been in Sacramento you have not deigned to visit me. Won't you come up this morning and sit with us in banc? My colleague, Judge Crocker, is absent, and you might as well occupy his seat.'

"'Oh, yes, I'll come,' returned Miss Shafter, and the subject was dropped and I am sure Judge Wallace never dreamed that the invitation would be accepted.

"About an hour afterward, Miss Shafter, accompanied by one of the officers of her father's staff, came to my office and said that she wanted to go to the Supreme Court. Would I take her? With pleasure. And away we went. A young attorney was arguing a case when we entered the court. He did not notice us as we quietly seated ourselves, and went on with most brilliant eloquence. Judge Wallace laid his hand on the arm of the empty chair and nodded to my companion to take it.

"'Shall I go up?' she asked of me.

"'Why, certainly,' I responded. 'It would be discourteous to the bench not to do so.'

"She hesitated a little, but as Judge Wallace regarded her with a smiling invitation and patted the chair provokingly, she arose and firmly and with the grace of a queen, walked up the aisle to the platform. The judges arose and gravely bowed. Wallace stepped forward, and, extending his hand, escorted her to the vacant chair and each justice was presented to her in turn and shook the tiny hand of their dainty associate. Miss Shafter was quite equal to the occasion, and, bowing, took her seat and let the case proceed. That young attorney, though, lost his head, and afterwards lost his case. Whether he wished to make an impression on the new associate or whether the strangeness of the proceedings rattled him, I never learned, but he got badly tied up in his peroration.

"What did Judge Wallace do? Why, at dinner that evening he conferred with the new judge and insisted upon her occupying the seat on the bench next day. After dinner he asked me to take a walk with him. 'Beck,' said he, 'if you bring that girl into court in the morning I'll have proceedings instituted to declare your position vacant.—San Francisco Call.

COOKING ON THE TABLE.

HAIRDRESSING A LA MODE.

Crimping and Waving Now the Most Salient Features.

Of the many items which constitute fashionable hairdressing, says The Lady's Pictorial, crimping and waving are the most salient features. Fringes will never go utterly out of fashion, but the arrangement differs from season to season. Just now the fringe is short, light and closely curled, and most of the curly rings are turned back, while a few stray in studied carelessness over the forehead and temples.

The first figure shows the waved front, drawn over the pompadour frizette, which no woman of fashion should be without, as it forms the most charming of evening coiffures. Over the forehead a fringe of short hair is curled, and this may be light or heavy, straight or irregular, or brought down to a point in front to suit the features.

In the lower figure the pompadour frizette is again used to support the hair which is closely waved and drawn back, giving a slight glimpse of a center parting. Where the hair is thin, limp or has been excessively cropped for the old type of fringe, fashion can still be followed, for there are compact fringes of gossamer lightness and from these depend waved tresses, thin and aerial as the proverbial cobweb, which form the complete dressing for the top and with a Mervelleuse frame, the black hair may be arranged with, or without, the addition of a false tress, as may be required.

The Origin of Champagne.

This was the origin of "fizz." The pioneer maker of champagne was a monk. Dom Perignon, cellarer at the Abbey of Hautvilliers near Epernay, who, about the year 1670, began to make experiments in bottling wine of the district, while in its second state of fermentation. He soon found that the corks made of greased hemp, which were then in general use, were ill-suited to his purpose and he substituted the bark of that species of oak now known as the cork tree in England and the chenellege in France. By tying his cork down he succeeded in imprisoning the carbonic acid gas which is the cause of effervesence, except when it was strong enough to burst the bottle. Subsequently M. Francois discovered a means of ascertaining the exact quantity of sugar to secure sufficient fermentation of the wine in bottle to render it sparkling, and not so much as to burst the bottles.

THE TRIUMPH OF LOVE

IS HAPPY, FRUITFUL MARRIAGE.

Every Man Who Would Know the Grand Truths; the Plain Facts; the New Discoveries of Medical Science as applied to Married Life; Who Would Atone for Past Errors and Avoid Future Pitfalls, Should Secure the Wonderful Little Book Called "COMPLETE MANHOOD and How to Attain It.

"Here at last is information from a high medical source that must work wonders with this generation of men."

The book fully describes a method by which to attain full vigor and manly power.

A method by which to end all unnatural drains on the system.

To cure nervousness, lack of self control, despondency, etc.

To exchange a jaded and worn nature for one of brightness, buoyancy and power.

To cure forever effects of excesses, overwork, worry etc.

To give full strength, developement and tone to every portion and organ of the body.

Age no barrier. Failure impossible. 2,000 references.

The book is purely medical and scientific, useless to curiosity seekers, invaluable to men only who need it.

A despairing man, who applied to us soon after wrote:

"Well, I tell you that first day is one I'll never forget. I just bubbled with joy. I wanted to hug everybody and tell them my old self had died yesterday and my new self was born to-day. Why didn't you tell me when I first wrote that I would find it this way?"

And another thus:

"If you dumped a cartload of gold at my feet it would not bring such gladness into my life as your method has done."

PERHAPS

splendid large fruit of a beautiful deep rose color. The rind is composed of large, pointed scales, tipped with green—the blossom end somewhat resembling that of the pomegranate. It is spherical and measures from seven to eleven inches in circumference. When cut open a pulpy, translucent centre is disclosed, dotted with shining black seeds about the size of large pinheads and soft like fig seeds. The pulp is cool, juicy and delicately sweet. It is surrounded by a broad band of brilliant carmine about three-eights of an inch wide, which makes a striking contrast and renders it a most picturesque fruit for the table. Cut in halves, sprinkled with sugar and eaten with a spoon from its deep, carmine cup, it is dainty enough for the most fastidious. By some the taste for this fruit might have to be cultivated, as is the case with olives and figs, but it looks good enough to eat—and almost too pretty.—From the Land of Sunshine.

Telephones.

Tricks over the telephone wire have always been popular, and the public is every ready to hear of a sermon preached in one city being heard by a second congregation whose minister has disappointed them in a place in the State; of a metropolitan concert being shared in at quarter prices by an humble audience in a distant village; and of the gay Parisian, who can drop into the theatrophone office and hear what is going on in all the theatres of Paris. As a rule, such exhibitions as these are more curious than really useful, but occasionally they are of the utmost practicability and value. At the last annual staff dinner of the National Telephone Company, at the well-known Holborn restaurant in London, there was great disappointment among the 200 present that the president of the company was lying on a sick-bed at Folkestone. This, however, did not hinder him from saying to the assemblage exactly what he would have said had he been present. A telephone was taken into his room, and over this he spoke directly to the chairman and the reporters, whose heads were fitted with receivers. The speech was afterwards given to the meeting, its reading being listened to by the far-off president, who also heard the applause with which it was received. Finally, the chairman wished him, through the telephone, good sleep, pleasant dreams, and a speedy restoration to health, and bade him good-bye and good-night. There was a wide awake lawyer who, starting for a real estate sale in New Jersey, a few days ago, found, on arriving at his expected destination, that the sale was to be at a town twenty miles off, and the hour at which it was fixed was already at hand. As it was impossible for him to reach the other town in time for the sale, he went to the nearest telephone, and put in his bids over the wire. What is more, he secured the property, following his successful bid by train, and signing the necessary papers.—New York Times.

Snow in the Sierra Nevada Mountains.

I have seen four feet of snow fall in eight hours, said Conductor Cobb of the Maine Central, to the Lewiston Journal man, and yet it was so light that you could wade through it almost as easily as you can through water.

It was in the Sierra Nevada Mountains—a sort of frost-like snow that falls in the night, burying everything. Twelve feet away from another man you can just see him, with a sort of halo around him, as though somewhere the sun was shining through the storm. In these storms it is impossible to tell direction or distance. One is simply lost when only a short distance from camp.

In the morning we walked down into town. One man went ahead breaking the snow, which came nearly to his armpits, as he moved through it. He would tread until tired, when he would drop to the rear, and some one else would lead the procession. As we walked into the valley it grew less, and down below in the town there had been no snow, and all the time the sun or the stars had shone. Such a snow goes like the dew—disappears, evaporates.

THE BAKE OVEN.

was invited to a dinner of six courses, which was cooked in the dining-room of the host by the lady of the house, with the help of a butler, the entire preparation consuming less than an hour and a half, during which time the lady found time to converse with her guests and superintend the setting of the table besides. It must certainly be admitted that while taking up very little space, and insuring absolute cleanness, this way of cooking is superior to the old way in many respects. The total absence of heat in the room where the cooking is done cannot be praised too much, as every housewife will testify with pleasure.

Cycling Jokes.

"That's a curious typographical error," said Mrs. Partridge. "The title of this new book is printed 'The Viking Age.'"

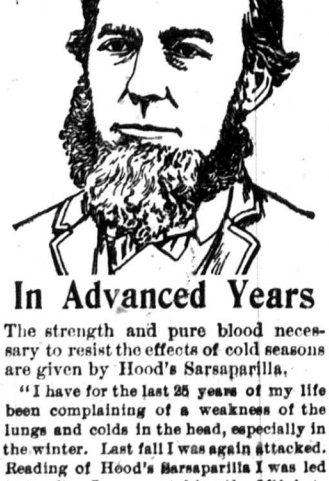
"Well, why not?" asked Partridge. "What ought it to be?"

"Why—Biking, oughtn't it?"

"How would you conjugate the verb to bike, pa?" asked Johnny.

"Bike, boke, biking, bak," said Mr. Knowitall. "Can you remember that?"

"I guess so," said Johnny. "Bike, buok, broken back. Is that it?"—Harper's Bazar.



In Advanced Years

The strength and pure blood necessary to resist the effects of cold seasons are given by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"I have for the last 25 years of my life been complaining of a weakness of the lungs and colds in the head, especially in the winter. Last fall I was again attacked. Reading of Hood's Sarsaparilla I was led to try it. I am now taking the fifth bottle with good results. I can positively say that I have not spent a winter as free from coughs or pains and difficult breathing spells for the last 25 years as was last winter. I can lie down and sleep all night without any annoyance from cough or pain in the lungs or asthmatic difficulty." E. M. CHAMBERS, J. P., Cornhill, N. B.

Why is it that men are so ready to believe what they want to believe, even when they know mighty well they don't believe it; that women kiss at parting and meeting though they don't want to, and they know perfectly well that it's a nuisance all round; that a wife will profess her utter contempt for her husband's judgment, while knowing all the while that his good judgment was displayed in his choice of a wife.

On Monday a gang of tramps left the G. T. R. station and proceeded up to the bank beyond the railroad bridge by the Catholic cemetery. Moved to Picton.

That well-knowen citizen, George W. Goodwin, removed from his old stand on Dundas street to Picton this week. We regret his departure for many reasons but principally because of the loss of a genuine reformer to the party here. We wish George all the success he deserves. We may appropriately append here a foreign opinion as to the merits of Mr. Goodwin's chart, called "Pharoah's Dream." It is from the pen of Mr. J. McParlin, and is addressed to the chairman of the "People's Party."

Dear Sir and Bro.,—You received a letter, while at St. Louis, no doubt, addressed to you by George W. Goodwin, Box 377, Napanee, Ont., Can., relative to a chart which he has had copyrighted in the United States and Canada, illustrating production, transportation, consumption, communication etc. in a peculiarly marked and able manner. The chart, either by printed or oral instructions may be easily understood and in the hands of persons who fully understand it, it will do more good than the ablest speech, unaided by the deductions naturally drawn from its full definition and application. The chart is known as "Pharaoh's Dream" and can be made peculiarly interesting in the hands of a chalk artist who may intersperse his talk with illustrations upon a black board. He is willing to give a reasonable royalty to the national Committee for handling his charts.

I have met Mr. Goodwin personally and I requested him to write you, he has recommendations from the leading business men of Canada and statesmen of that Province, regardless of Party. He has a reputation of being one of the ablest writers of economic philosophy in the Dominion; he is a very scholarly man, of pleasing address and good appearance.

I feel that the adoption of his chart would result in much good.

Mr. Goodwin spent one entire evening illustrating the chart to me and I am free to confess, although I have met many reformers, never before were the schemes of the money power in its devilish, intelligent, all powerful organization met with such a clear perspicuous criticism, so plain that one who ran might read, as it did at the hands of Mr. Goodwin in the space of that one evening, and proper explanations of his chart will make the most skeptical opponent put on his thinking cap.

I am deeply in earnest in hoping that you will bring this matter before your Congressional Committee and take such actions as will result in our reaping a reward of this able man's creation.

The Chicago Cricketers.

Largely owing to the efforts of Dr. Leonard, the indefatigable secretary of the Napanee cricket club, there arrived in Napanee on Sunday evening a party of cricketers from Illinois, whom we will term the Gentlemen of Chicago, and the name is no misnomer. They are all gentlemen in the true sense of the word, and to use a sporting phrase are "cricket players right from the drop of the hat" The thanks of the cricketers of this district are due to Dr.

A Victory for Napanee.

An interesting foot ball match was played at Bath on Monday evening, when the Scarlet foot ball club of Napanee met and worsted the Bath team by three goals to one. The game was hotly contested from start to finish and some brilliant playing was done by both sides, but the superior combination work of the Scarlets was very apparent. The Bath boys are comparatively speaking a new team, and with a little more practice, and a little more attention to combination work will make it decidedly interesting for other teams before the seasons closes. They are a gentlemanly lot of fellows, and our boys are loud in praise of the courteous treatment, and kindly reception accorded them by the foot ball club, and the good people of Bath generally. Mr. Herb Ashley made an impartial and efficient referree and his decisions gave entire satisfaction. The Napanee team was composed as follows: goal, E. Hayes; backs, W. Ashley, S Skates; half backs, Capt. W. B. Haines, R. Ham, Wm. Grange; Forwards, W. Exley and P. Preston, C. Fox, F. Grieve and P. Wagar.

Walking for his Health.

W. J. Thaler is the name of a tall, stout, innocent looking Austrian who called on The Express on Wednesday morning. He carries on his breast a silver badge on which is engraved in French and English the information that the bearer left Montreal on May 13th to walk around the world. From what we could learn from the somewhat unintelligible English of Mr. Thaler he is out on the expedition for the good of his eyes. Some time ago he lost his sight and a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre he alleges partially restored his vision, and he thinks by visiting the great religious shrines of the world he will completely recover his eyesight. He has a book in which the chief of police of each of the cities and towns that he has visited certify that he has called upon them on such a day, and the signatures of editors of various newspapers along the line are affixed to the statement that he called upon them on a given date. Thaler expects to make the round trip in about seven years. He carries photographs of himself and disposed of a number. He put up at the Royal hotel on Tuesday night and left for Belleville Wednesday afternoon.

Wedding Breakfast.

The show window of our enterprising Confectioner, W. H. Davis, came in for a great deal of inspection on Saturday last, and the many flattering remarks passed on Will's exhibit of a wedding breakfast is proof of its value as an advertisement. Mr. Davis had caused to be placed in the window a small table and on it was arrayed a complete wedding breakfast, comprising jellies, roast goose, a handsome wedding cake, beautifully frosted and figured, wine, and other desert the whole being tastefully set off with flowers of various kinds. The array of good things filled one with a laudable desire to be an invited guest at a wedding where Mr. Davis was the caterer. The people of Napanee have reason to congratutate themselves on having such a skilful caterer, and we feel assured that persons contemplating matrimony will patronise him, in preferance to going out of town, as is too often the case, for what they can be supplied with much better at home. During this leafy month of June Mr. Davis has acted as caterer for several of the most fashionable weddings of the season, and on every hand one hears nothing but flattering remarks about the banquets prepared by him.

week of cricket will do much to boom the game and enhance its popularity here. Mr. Helliwell, a former manager of the Dominion Bank here, induced the Chicago eleven to take the trip, and his many friends in Napanee were pleased to see him again after an absence of about ten years. The first of the series of matches that the club has played with the teams of this district took place at the Napanee Driving Park on Monday, and resulted in a victory for Chicago by an innings and three runs. It was no disgrace for Napanee to be beaten by this team, and we are safe in saying that in defeating our cricketers the best team in the district was conquered. The Chicago men are excellent batters, and good bowlers, but it is in their fielding that they shine, and to see them scoop a ball you would think they were an aggregation of crack base ball players. Mr. J. Cummings is no doubt their best batter, and he ran up a score of 32 runs. The other Chicago men making a double score were Messrs. T. and C. Ballingall. Napanee's bowling was good, but the fielding was somewhat weak. Our boys played in somewhat hard luck, apparently. Messrs. Richardson, G. E. Maybee, and Dr. Leonard succeeded in making double scores. Mr. F. Richardson as wicket keeper did excellent work, while Mr. J. Cummings in a similar capacity for the visitors. The following is the score by innings:

NOTES.

Dr. Leonard entertained the Chicago and Napanee cricket clubs and a number of their friends by giving a smoking party at his residence on Monday evening. A most enjoyable time was spent.

Mr. Archy Clark photographed the Chicago cricket club during an interval of rest in Monday's game, and at the conclusion of the match a photograph of the two clubs, together with a number of ladies, was taken.

The Napanee cricket club chartered the steamer Reindeer yesterday afternoon and took the Chicago team and a number of other friends to Glenora.

The final match, which will be played at the Napanee Driving Park to morrow, promises to be an exciting contest. Chicago will play against a team composed of selections from the cricket clubs of the Bay of Quinte district.

Chicago defeated the Kingston cricket club by an innings and 40 runs.

We learn from the Intelligencer that the cricketers of Belleville are angry at the Chicago eleven for their action in cancelling their engagement to play there yesterday.

Rev. T. D. Phillips is one of the oldest cricket players in Canada. He was at one time a resident of Ontario, and one of her ablest players.

There are 8 Englishmen, one Scotchman, one Irishman and a Canadian in the Chicago team.

A Pleasant Trip.

On Friday last, according to previous arrangement, a number of the members of the County Council with two or three friends paid a visit to Reeve Filson, of Amherst Island. It was resolved to leave Napanee at 6 o'clock a. m., by Capt. Holmes' steam yacht "Dorothy," and by half past six the Napanee party were all "on deck" and a start was made. The morning was exceedingly fine with a cool breeze blowing just strong enough to make a pleasant ripple on the water, and yet just warm enough to make everyone feel comfortable. Shortly after leaving Napanee a halt was made down the river, and Mr. J. C. Carscallen taken on board, and when nearing Deseronto a halt was made to pick up Mr. Oliver, who came off in a boat to intercept the steamer. From here a pleasant run was had to Glenora, where the party stayed sufficiently long to make arrangements for supper on the return trip. From Glenora to Stella was then in order, and the "Dorothy" was soon going along in great style with plenty of steam, and behaved handsomely in the somewhat troubled water. It is a delightful trip from Napanee to Stella quite long enough for most people and yet not too tedious, as the route is a charming one, the ever changing landscape and the sparkling water being a continuous source of delight, especially to anyone who does not too often go upon the water for a trip. Even the beauties of the river and the bay may pall upon those who often visit them; but on such day as last Friday, when nature was in one of her brightest and most enjoyable moods, the old wayfarer must have felt some thing of the subtle influence of the time. The party on board the Dorothy enjoyed to the full all the novelty and beauty of the trip, and not one had any "tired feeling" when Stella was reached, which was about midday. A short stay was made in Stella while rigs were procured to transport the party across the Island, as Mr. Filson lives about two miles from Stella. A short drive brought the party to its destination, and there the sad part of the trip commenced, as it was found that Mr. Filson was not so well as he had been for some days previously and that he was confined to his bed. Mrs. Filson very kindly received the visitors, and one by one all had a short interview with the sick man, who was much gratified with the visit. As it was not desirable to make a long stay, the party resolved on a drive around the eastern end of the island; which is somewhat picturesque, and was delightful on this particular day because of the breeze blowing off Lake Ontario, which cooled the ardour of the sun's rays and made being out doors at this particular spot delightful. The lilac trees and syringas were just in the full beauty of bloom, and the fruit trees were laden with promise of a large crop, in this part of the island, everything here being two weeks later than more inland, consequently the vegetation escaped the late frost which was so fatal to lots of fruit and flowers around Napanee. The lateness of the season and the freedom from late or early frosts is of course due to the nearness of the large lake. While driving back to Stella a good view of the small islands called "The Brothers" was obtained, as also of the causeway leading from the small island almost to Amherst, which is the more visible just now in consequence of the low water in the lakes. Reaching Stella the wind was found to be blowing rather freely for a return just then, therefore a desultory ramble and chat with the good folks of the village ensued until the pleasure seekers. The "Dorothy" left the sparkling waves rapidly behind her, and disclosed the glorious panorama of this part of the Bay of Quinte, under the favourable conditions of a setting sun and an almost unclouded sky. It was dark ere Glenora was reached, and from this point homeward a brilliant starlight night was enjoyed. Just enough light to steer by and that was all. But Napanee was reached in the early morning, and this time "that tired feeling" had generally got the better of the party, the different members soon bidding each other "good morning," and seeking the arms of Morpheus.

Capt. Holmes received and earned the thanks of the travellers for the outing enjoyed on his beautiful yacht, and for the urbanity and kindness extended too much praise cannot be given; but we know the captain is a modest man and does not desire us to enlarge too much on his achievements as a captain and an entertainer. The company are ever so much obliged for the trip, however, and as the captain made an offer of an outing at any time himself and his yacht were disengaged, it will not surprise us to hear of a "repeat," or a trip somewhat similar before the season gets too far advanced.

Base ball.

Newburgh and Odessa played a game at Newburgh on Saturday last. The game was very friendly throughout and the umpiring of Mr. Denyes of Odessa pleased everybody. Score:

Newburgh	1	0	10	3	1	2	6	0	1	—24
Odessa	1	3	0	1	6	6	3	2	6	—23

Struck out by Newburgh 10, by Odessa 7. F. Cairns burst his finger in the fifth innings but pluckily caught the game through. Yarker plays at Newburgh to-morrow. It will be another close game.

Some Modern Superstitions.

Are you superstitious? It is astonishing in this age to find how many people believe in signs. Some folks fancy it is unlucky to fall overboard on Monday, or to take hold of a buzz-saw in motion on Tuesday, or fall down stairs with the baby in your arms on Wednesday, or to walk underneath a ladder and have it fall on you on Thursday, or do any blessed thing at all on Friday. But all agree that it is very unlucky to go to church on Sunday without wearing one of radford and son's celebrated regal shirts.

Douglas v. McDougall.

As the date of the contest approaches interest in the bicycle race between the two noted Scotch riders: McDougal and Douglas becomes intensified. For some time back a spirit of friendly rivalry has existed between them, and to set all doubts at rest as to which is the faster rider, they have consented to ride once around the race track at the Driving Park this (Friday) evening at 7.30 o'clock. To afford every one an opportunity of witnessing this epoch making race no admission fee will be charged. Come early and avoid the jam at the gate.

The residence of Captain Rankin, South Napanee, was the scene of a pleasant event on Wednesday when his daughter, Miss Florence Rankin, and Mr. J. F. Chalmers, of Adolphustown, were united in the holy bonds of matrimony by the Rev. D. McEachern. Miss Rankin is a decidedly popular young lady and she carries away with her the kind wishes of many friends for her future happiness. Mr. Chalmers is the popular reeve of the township of Adolphustown, and the youngest member of the county council of Lennox & Addington, and we join with his numerous friends in extending our hearty congratulations.

master at the collegiate institute, was to be dismissed at a meeting of the school board to be held on Tuesday evening, in consequence of some differences between himself and the principal. A number of the heaviest ratepayers in the town thought more light was desirable before any action should be taken, and therefore petitioned the board to have a full and impartial investigation into the causes of the trouble, or else to let both the principal and science master leave. When the school board met on Tuesday evening there were a number of the petitioners present. The report of Mr. Seoth was read anent the trouble, and the recommendation of this inspector seemed to be that one or both the gentlemen should be replaced by new men, because the trouble between them was injuring the school. A motion was made by Messrs. Preston and Cowan that a science master be advertised for. An amendment was offered by Messrs. Herrington and Pruyn that a principal and science master be advertised for; or that a full investigation be made by the board into the cause of the trouble, to locate the blame. After some discussion the latter part of Messrs. Herrington and Pruyn's amendment was voted on, and carried by 7 to 3. There will therefore be an investigation. The chairman, Mr. H. M. Deroche, named as a committee of enquiry; Messrs. Pruyn, Preston, Herrington and Cowan. Yielding to a unanimously expressed wish, Mr. Deroche consented to be chairman of this special committee, whose labours will commence at once. We must call the attention of the public to one part of Mr. Seath's report, where objection is made to one teacher being allowed to occupy his time instructing one pupil, and informing the board that another teacher would be needed if this were to continue.

FIGURES THAT TALK.

BY REV. W. H. ADAMS.

Talk is cheap; and torrents of it are being poured out of late by the Horner propaganda in disparagement of the Methodist church and, in this section particularly, in disparagement of that church's operations in the Madoc district. We are constantly assured in very vulgar verbiage that the church in question is inefficient or effete, and that unless she undergo some wounderous metamorphosis it is her doom to be soon and suddenly destroyed. Proof of this is not offered; indeed is not thought necessary; it is deemed enough for us to take the bald and boisterous declaration, set our house in order, and prepare for the day when we shall tear down our steeples and demolish our churches—or, forsooth, auction them for warehouses or shambles.

Now, for one, I am, somehow or other, so constituted that I must have reasonable proof before I swallow these astounding statements. But there is not a man in the

CHANCERY DIVISION
WOLFE vs. A. WOLFE.

Pursuant to the judgment made in this action on the sixth day of June, 1895, there will be sold by public Auction with the approbation of the Local Master at Napanee, at the Court House in the town of Napanee, on Saturday, July 13th, 1895,

at 2 p.m., the following valuable farm and village property.

PARCEL NUMBER ONE—That portion of lot number 45, in the second concession of the township of Camden, county of Lennox and Addgtn, containing about 100 acres, lying south of the Napanee river and easterly of the road from Wilton to Colebrooke leading across the Colebrooke bridge and that part of the south half of said lot lying westerly of said road known as village lot "A" on plan of Colebrooke made by M. P. Rombough, P.L.S., save and except therefrom village lot lettered C on said plan.

PARCEL NUMBER TWO—Village lot lettered "C" part of lot number 45 in the second concession of Camden aforesaid.

Upon parcel number one is erected a good frame house and barn, driving house and two tenant houses. The property is well watered and lies in the village of Colebrooke.

Upon parcel number two is erected a large stone house and a frame store or storehouse, and a drive house. The village lot contains about 1¼ acres and was the home of the late Mrs Wolfe.

The property will be sold subject to a reserve bid fixed by the Master.

TERMS OF SALE:—A deposit of $10 for every $100 of the purchase money at the time of sale, the balance within one month thereafter without interest. In all other respects the terms and conditions of sale will be the standing conditions of sale of this court.

statements. But there is now a man in the whole loud-voiced faction who will furnish the ghost of a shadow of such proof. There is not a man who can furnish a solitary fact that will weigh in the argument. There is not a man who can find the least vestige of a foundation on which to base these malicious slanders.

Proof, positive, palpable proof, is all of an opposite character. Facts all preponderate in the opposite scale. Facts, solid facts, all go to demonstrate very clearly that the Methodist church in the Madoc district is both active and efficient; that she has been active and efficient in the past, and that there is no sign of inefficiency or inertia overtaking her in the days to come.

Having been elected Secretary of the district, it has been my duty during the last few days to handle the official returns that have just come in from the fourteen fields into which the district is divided. Now, figures are usually dry details, but they crystallize for us in these schedules the labors, and travels, and consecration, and prayers of fourteen Ministers of Gospel during the past year, and the zealous christian work of over three hundred officials of the church during the same period. Moreover, these figures represent facts which no amount of loud talk can dissolve or destroy. And these are the facts, and the only accessible or reliable facts, by which we may estimate, or measure, or weigh the Methodism of this district.

I have been led to compare the figures with those of the year 1890, when the Madoc district, as at present constituted was first formed. The result is of such a character that it hurls back the lie upon the teeth of those who defame us, and it must reassure every good Methodist that the church of his choice is both alive and alert.

Since 1890 there have been reported removed by death and other causes 2,182 members of our church in the district. In that year our membership stood at 2,623, and this year, despite the large loss above indicated, we report 3,085 members—a net increase in the semi-decade of 462. In 1890 we had 39 Sunday Schools 2 31 teachers, and 1,910 scholars; this year we report 47 schools, 327 teachers, and 2,499 scholars. In these schools during the past year nearly two thousand library books and four thousand weekly and fortnightly illustrated periodicals have been circulating, and who can estimate the far-reaching and beneficent effects of so much pure and wholesome literature in the land?

In 1890 again, the district raised for Connexional Funds $1,341, and for circuit proposes $4,103. This year we report for the former $3,051 and for the latter $7,490. In 1890 we owned property to the value of $90,000, this year our property is worth more than $100,000. The grand total raised on the district in 1890 was 14,037, this year, despite the hard times, it amounted to $16,651. Other figures that further illustrate the life and progress of Methodism in this district are forthcoming but let these suffice.

Now for my first and last word concerning Hornerism. It shows a strange lack of christian charity for any person or party to gloat over the destruction of another, or to make capital out of their discomfiture or downfall. But what does it argue when capital is made out of the pretended or fabricated distress of another, or, in other words, out of the gross, and wilful, and deliberate defamation of a Christian church? We don't question any man's right legitimately to do all the good he can, we rather bid him God speed in his work, but in the name of common decency, we do demand that the men who pose as the special favorites of Heaven, shall at least condescend to speak the truth.

Methodism has been tried here by the stern law of the survival of the fittest. Hornerism now comes to have its test. In five year's time, if God spare us, we shall find the former, as to-day, still firmly rooted in the soil, and spreading her branches unto places more remote. Of the latter we may safely say in the words of the old aphorism: "Nous verrons que nous verrons."

NEWS FROM THE COUNTRY

A FINE PROCESSION.

Last Tuesday, June 25th, was a gala day at the station in Napanee. Farmers were in from all parts of the surrounding country to take home with them the harvesting and hay making machines they had ordered from MESSRS. HAWLEY & SPROULE, the live agents for the enterprising firm of NOXON BROS. MANUFACTURING CO'Y, of Insersoll. This was HAWLEY & SPROULE'S first delivery of farming implements, and they intend having another later on. There were delivered at the station upwards of forty machines, comprising binders, reapers, mowers and rakes. The farmers after loading the machines on their wagons, formed a procession and drove to the Campbell House where they were entertained to a special dinner prepared by Mr. Milling at the expense of NOXON BROS. MF'G. CO. Mr. Stephen Noxon one of the Company, was present and was indeed pleased to know that the farmers in the vicinity of Napanee had still the old confidence in his Company that they always have had. He being an old Bay of Quinte boy it was a pleasure to see so many of their far famed machines delivered so near his boyhood's home to so many good farmers. It might be just mentioned that NOXON BROS'. business has increased over one hundred per cent in the last two years. MESSRS. HAWLEY & SPROULE deserve credit for the business they are doing and they should feel proud of the confidence placed in them by the farmers of this part of the country as well as the Company they represent. The Company were also represented by R. W. Ewen and B. J. Armstrong, two of their general agents who report a large number of sales all over Ontario. There were a number of farmers who were unable to get in for their machines in time for dinner or take part in the procession. About two o'clock the farmers hitched up their teams and started for home pleased with their days outing and also with the treatment they received from HAWLEY & SPROULE and satisfied they had bought the best machines in the market.

WILTON.

The telephone connection between Wilton and Yarker is completed.

Rev. Mr. Cormack preached in the Presbyterian church Sunday evening.

There will be no service in the Methodist church next Sunday morning as Rev. Mr. Coombe expects to take a few day's rest. However there will be a union service in the Methodist chhrch in the evening, Rev. Dr. Fleming taking charge of it.

Do not neglect your precious eyesight, and delay till it is beginning to leave you it might then be too late, but with the first symptoms of weak eyes, or failing vision, go to Smith & Bro's, consult their Optician, and he will advise you as to the best course to pursue. Examination free of charge.

Why Not You?

When thousands of people are taking Hood's Sarsaparilla to overcome the weakness and languor which are so common at this season, why are you not doing the same? When you know that Hood's Sarsarparilla has power to cure rheumatism, dyspepsia and all diseases caused by impure blood, why do you continue to suffer? Hood's cures others, why not you?

Resignations Galore,

The resignation of the Rev. Mr. MacEachern makes the fifth in the history of the Presbyterian church, Napanee. The first who found it necessary to resign was Mr. Steele, then shortly after Mr. Scott, after a long and faithful pastorate, was obliged to tender his resignation and leave. Then Mr. Young for justifiable reasons we have no doubt, resigned twice, but finally he was persuaded to withdraw, and now Mr. MacEachern resigns because of ill health, which will be finally disposed of on the second Tuesday in July. Mr. MacEachern is at present under call to Winchester Springs.

give your house a coat of paint. If you buy your material right it will cost you only a small amount. Call or write to Napanee Paint works for sample color cards and prices, and, if you wish, we will furnish you with a sample of the White Lead we use and will pay one hundred dollars for every ounce of adulteration found in it. We use nothing but the best lead, oil and coloring materials, and as we have the best machinery for grinding and mixing paints we can save you money, if you intend to paint your house. If you want a can of Pure Ready Mixed Paints, any size, ask your dealer for Madden's, it will please you.

NEW VETERINARY COLLEGE.

We present our readers with a cut of Kingston's most recent educational institution. The fact that the new college is to be connected with Queen's University will ensure that its organization, its teaching, and its future graduates will be superior. It is in no sense a private school started for private gain, but it is a BONA FIDE branch of the School of Mining and Agriculture, incorporated by Act of the Ontario Legislature, three years ago, and having on its Board of Governors such men as Principal Grant, the Hon. Wm. Harty, Hiram Calvin, M. P.; E. W. Rathbun, Deseronto; E. J. B. Pense, of the Kingston Whig, and other prominent business and and professional men. Dr. Knight, the

At Ellisville, near Gananoque, an old man and his son have been boarding for some time with a woman of whose conduct the community does not approve. A party of disguised men surrounded the house and administered a coat of tar and feathers to all three persons. The son was mounted on a rail and ridden to a mud pool and dropped in. The woman was accorded twelve hours in which to leave that section, but has not obeyed the warning. The two men have fortified their home and liberty by purchasing firearms, and will shoot if they are again interfered with. The whitecaps are determined upon another sortie, and serious trouble may arise.—Ontario.

At Kingston on Tuesday night Sergt.-Major Morgans defated Sergt-Major Kelley of Halifax N, S. in a match for the fencing championship of Canada by 4 points.

A very sad accident occurred at the dam at Bancroft on Monday, 17th inst; while several men were engaged in cutting away a log that held a jam in front of the dam, the log suddenly broke and let two men, John Barnart and Michael Sabourin, down the slide among the logs. For some distance below the dam there is a very bad rapids and down this the men and logs were hurried, being seen only now and then by the horrified spectators assembled to see the breaking of the jam. T. W. Aykroyd had gone below the dam about 100 yards to take a picture of the logs when the jam broke and fortunately Sobourin came near that side and was pulled out on a side jam nearly drowned and hurt in the chest and legs. This letter injury was received from a log which struck him while he was being hauled out. His rescue was not one second too soon. Barnart was seen about fifty yards below clinging to a log, but as he did not appear again, it is thought the log struck a side jam a few yards ahead and that he was carried under. The jam has been since cleared away and every effort made to secure the body, but without avail. It is thought he is covered up in the sand and sticks washed down by the current.

A Question of Comfort.

"I should think," remarked Mr. Lushforth, "that a woman would be clear miserable carrying around those swelled sleeves."

A foot ball match, which was to have taken place between the Bath and Stella clubs on Saturday night, did not take place. Quite a number went from here to see it, and were quite disappointed.

We have had very hot weather lately and the fine rain we had last night did a great deal of good.

Boating seems quite common around here now.

On Saturday next there is to be a missionary meeting held here by Mrs. Bowerman and Mrs. Gibson, of Napanee, for the purpose of starting a missionary circle in our midst.

BATH.

As the product of the pen is almost always affected by its surroundings and in looking around for interesting items for your faithful and trusty paper we find a difficulty in obtaining just the material that would interest the thoughtful reader, arising from the fact that mainly this warm and dry weather has driven men and women to some cool retreat where news is not likely to eminate.

We are glad to notice that the Harlem Flats Estate which has been in litigation for a number of years has become closed in favour of the heirs and claimants, of whom there are a large number living in Canada. Among the fortunate ones is Mr. Covert, one of our townsmen, who holds 6 shares.

Rev. W. B. Tucker leaves this week for Europe. He will likely return in six weeks.

The annual Pic' Nic' in connection with the Methodist church will take place on second Thursday in July at Millhaven. A grand time is expected and a large attendance from surrounding schools invited.

Looking out from our sanctum we behold the cheerful and stately figure of Rev. H. Sheppard going up the street with his brother Ernest, for a brief visit.

Mr. C. Mills looks quite cheerful over the change of time per G.T.R. mail trains.

England Has a Community of Empires.

England leads the world in acuteness in finding out the better portions of the earth that are attainable and in her enterprise and energy in possessing herself of them. She has quietly as it were, but apparently successfully, laid the foundation for another vast empire in Africa. It extends from the Cape of Good Hope to Lake Tanganyika and is as large as all Europe. Besides he valuable gold mines there, coal and iron have also been found in large quantities, and civilization is advancing in that region as rapidly as it did in California after the gold discoveries, so it is said. England is truly a wonderful nation. In comparison with what she has done in spreading her influence throughout the world, civilizing and leaving her impress on it and accumulating wealth, the achievements of Rome are almost commonplace. What is thus said of the empire of the Caesars might also be said in like comparison of England with the other nationalities, ancient and modern. While Russia, as the most conspicuous in the number, is a vast empire and alike impressive in its area and population, it has exerted very little influence outside of its own domain; not a tithe of what England has. England is indeed a great force, morally and intellectually, in commerce and manufactures, as well as a great power considered in her geographical extensions and military prestige. The British Empire is a community of great empires, of which the latest, but by no means least interesting acquisition is, as said, the vast area, as large as Australia, seized upon by her within the last few years in Africa. A striking illustration of England's comparative commercial supremacy is found in the fact that more than two-thirds of the world's commerce through the Suez Canal is carried on under the British flag and in British bottoms. England is the great trader, the great banker, the great monopolist, the great colonizer, the great conqueror of the earth. What a picture of her colossal achievements is afforded in the mere grouping before the mind's eye of such children of her loins or brain as the United States, the Dominion of Canada, Australia, India, her new and vast African seizure, not including Egypt, and the countless islands of the sea over which floats the Cross of St. George as the sign manual of English supremacy.—Oswego Times.

THAT MUDDLED BIT OF HISTORY.

To the Editor of the Napanee Express,

Dear Sir,—I with many others have been waiting to hear the result of that arbitration in the historical point of difference between Messrs. Jarvis and Shorey. In the Beaver some time ago we read an article piteously imploring action, as the state of matters did grave injustice to Mr. Shorey. Mr. Bowerman tried to explain but the paragraph seemed, —was — decidedly lame. In reading these historic statements, so called by Mr. Shorey, I was forcibly reminded of the words "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." While we certainly want to hear the last of this ill advised controversy, begun by Mr. Shorey, we also want to hear the TRUTH of it. The object of this silence we all understand who have followed with intelligence the various letters written. It is to claim a victory where defeat now lies. And this section being overrun by a class who have more creed than christianity it will not hesitate a moment to perpetrate that which will feed its victory. A READER OF HISTORY.

NERVOUS PEOPLE!

Their Lot Is Not a Happy One.

AT HOME AND ABROAD THEY ARE MISERABLE.

Paine's Celery Compound Gives Them a New Life.

MAKES THEM HAPPY AND STRONG! BRIGHT AND VIVACIOUS!

Every Woman Should Try it.

The life of the nervous woman is a most unhappy one. She is continually miserable, and is frequently a burden to herself and family.

Nervousness is produced by a great variety of causes headaches, biliousness, constipation, dyspepsia, vertigo or giddiness, insomnia, despondency, and a host of other ailments.

As a rule, the use of drugs and medicines containing strong narcotics, only cause afflicted ones to sink deeper in suffering and agony.

Nature's true and permanent cure for all diseases is Paine's Celery Compound, a medicine now freely and wisley prescribed by the best physicians. The proprietors of Paine's Celery Compound have more testimonials from the women of Canada than have ever been given in favor of any other medicine in the world. Thousands have been saved who were once declared to be hopeless and incurable by the doctors.

Mrs. Joseph Vaillant, of Cache Bay, Nipissing District, Ont., who was recently cured of nervous prostration and neuralgia of the heart, writes as follows:—

"For a length of time I suffered very much from nervous prostration and neuralgia of the heart, and was unable to get regular sleep and rest. I used your great medicine Paine's Celery Compound with most beneficial results. I am happy to say that my condition of health is wonderfully improved; my sleep is sweet and natural, and the pains and nervous fears that troubled me are banished. I cannot speak too highly of Paine's Celery Compound."

Thos. McGreevy will no doubt prove a valuable adjunct to the Tories at the next general election. His experience in handling the swag will stand him in good stead.

Sir Richard Cartwright's statement that the selling power of farm lands has of late years decreased $10 an acre remains uncontradicted. The statement instead of being over is rather under the mark.

Under the N. P. there are two sets of duties collected, the duty on the imported goods, and the duty paid to the home manufacturer on the enhanced price of the goods which this iniquitous system allows him to levy.

The constituents of the members who assisted with their votes in whitewashing the Minister of Railways for his connection with the Curran bridge steal should "make note on it." Men who condone such offences are hardly fit stewards of the public interests.

Since the fishery overseer, Mr. E. H. Sills, seems reluctant to do so, it is not out of order to ask the sitting member for Lennox, Uriah Wilson, M. P., to rise and explain, why the names of all the men taking out a fishing license in this district were not published in the return appearing in the Auditor General's Report for the year ending 30th of June 1894.

When the farmer is prosperous all classes share in his prosperity. It is only when the pursuit of agriculture is successful and increasing that other industries can be legitimately extended. On the farmer depends the success of Canada. It is not by hampering and retarding his progress as the present N. P. does that we are to bring about prosperity, but by abolishing all restrictions and according to him the privilege of selling in the dearest and buying in the cheapest market.

Here are a few items from the trade and navigation returns for 1894. They illustrate how the farmers are bled so that the Tory Government may have the support of the manufacturer's boodle: The value of the total exports not including bullion, was $112.-426,658. Of this $103,776,744 represented the value of the "produce of mines, fisheries and forest; animals and their produce; agricultural products." The manufactures amounted to only $8,336,312. The total imports amounted to $123,474,940 of which $62,779.182 worth were dutiable and the duty amounted to $19,373,822. Of coal oil 6,608,270 gallons valued at $426,851 were imported. and the duty was $470.588—over a hundred per cent. $8,282,150 worth of raw sugar was admitted free, but the refined article was protected to the tune of twenty-seven per cent.

What resemblance, asks a contemporary, does any item of public expenditure in England bear to the Connolly-McGreevy steal of $56,000; the Curran Bridge steal of $270,000; the "hard pan" claim steal of $272,000; the waste of $476,000 on "Haggart's ditch," otherwise the Tay canal; the $224,000 dumped into the Caraquet railway maw; the $394,000 wasted on the Little Rapids lock; the $568,-000 cast into the Galops Rapids channel; the $1,118,000 squandered on "My Dear Onderdonk;" the $1,500,000 wasted, stolen or boodled in connection with the St. Charles branch of the I. C. R.; the $300.000 loaned to the Fredericton Bridge company, etc., etc., etc.? The total of the chief of these items foots up to more than five millions and a half, all of which represents what is, in truth, nothing short of public robbery. Comparisons are odious, but when such doings are compared with English procedure, the comparison becomes worse than odious. The suspicion of boodling in

TROUT CULTURE AT HOME.

Any One Who Has a Pure Running Stream Can Raise Brook Trout.

The culture of brook trout, even on a small scale, is a source of continual delight, and with pure running water at hand anyone who has carefully observed the habits and requirements of trout in their native brooks can successfully raise them. If a stream crosses the farm the pond should not be made directly in line with the course or bed of it, or freshets may wash its embankments away. At least every hard rain will roil the pond, depositing mud to the detriment of the finny prisoners. If a stream is to supply the water make the pond at one side of it, but never on a flat that may be overflowed. The best method is to delve the reservoir out of the side of some slope rising from the stream, and then carry the water to it by an open feeder, high enough up its source to permit of a gentle, easy flow, as seen in the accompanying sketch. This feeder may be a deep, narrow ditch with sod banks, and protected at both its ingress and egress by finely woven wire screens. The pond itself may not be more than four or five feet deep in the centre, sloping to a shallow edge at the circumference. Break up the ground with a plow, and then use a common road scraper in moving the earth to the lowest side. Repeating this operation, a circular or oblong excavation is made with strong earth banks. Then place four rocks on the bottom, each as large as a half-bushel measure, letting them rest far enough apart to be covered by a large, flat stone, under which the shy fish may hide. One such covert is sufficient for a pond of two or three square rods in extent, while several should be provided in larger ponds. If possible make a cold spring tributary to the pond, or if practicable make the pond around it, utilizing the fountain head for the water supply. Trout will succeeed best in cold spring water, but common creek water, if pure, will serve the purpose. Spread sand and gravel over the portion of the pond bed, but leave some of it with earth bottom. The slope surrounding the pond should be kept in grass, so that rains will not wash dirt into the water. A neat gravel walk should encircle the pond, and shade trees planted about it will serve to keep the water cool.

When angling for trout in the brooks it will be noticed that more than one-half of the fish caught are so little injured by the hook that they will live if immediately placed in fresh water. Carry a large pail, and by frequently changing the water two-thirds of the catch may be saved for stocking the fish pond. A slower way is to obtain the young fry from a fish hatchery. Very young trout can be fed on boiled eggs chopped fine, and larger ones on fresh beef cut into small pieces. Other scraps that the fish will eat, and which will not pollute the water, may be given them. They should be fed at least once a day, and in the cool of the evening they will frequently leap from the water to snap gamily at the food that is thrown to them.

Trout spawn in September and October, and it is well to take the screen away from the terminal end of the feeder in the fall, that the female fish may be encouraged to lay their eggs there.—American Agriculturist.

Dairy Notes.

Whenever the cows are not fed regularly they are kept in a restless condition, constantly expecting feed whenever the owner enters the barn, while if fed regularly the animals would be more quiet.

The regularity as well as the manner of the milker has much to do with the productiveness of the milk cow, as a allow the cream to get cold before plac-

You will see on that night, and only on that night, all of the most celebrated women of Paris, racing with linked arms about the asphalt pavement, which circles around the band stand. It is for them their one night of freedom in public, when they are permitted to conduct themselves as do their less prosperous sisters, when, instead of reclining in a victoria in the Bois, with eyes demurely fixed ahead of them, they can throw off restraint, and mix with all the men of Paris, and show their diamonds, and romp and dance and chaff and laugh as they did when they were not so famous. The French swells who are their escorts have cut down Chinese lanterns with their sticks and stuck the candles inside of them on the top of their high hats with the burning tallow, and made living torches of themselves. So on they go, racing by—first a youth in evening dress, dripping with candle grease, and then a beautiful girl in a dinner gown with her silk and velvet opera cloak slipping from her shoulders—all singing to the music of the band, sweeping the people before them, or closing in a circle around some stately dignitary, and waltzing furiously past him to prevent his escape. Sometimes one party will storm the band-stand, and size the musicians' instruments, while another invades the stage of the little theatre, or overpowers the woman in charge of the shooting gallery or institutes a hurdle race over the iron tables, and the wicker chairs.

Or you will see Ambassadors and men of title from the Jockey Club jostling cockney bookmakers and English lords to look at a little girl in a linen blouse and a flat straw hat, who is dancing in the same circle of shining shirt-fronts vis-a-vis to the most talked of young person in Paris, who wears diamonds in ropes, and who rode herself into notoriety by winning a steeplechase against a field of French officers. The first is a hired dancer, who will kick off some gentleman's hat, when she wants it, and pass it round for money, and the other is a companion of princes, and has probably never been permitted to enter the Jardin de Paris before; but the are both of the same class, and when the music stops for a moment they approach each other smiling, each on her guard against possible condescention or familiarity; and the hired dancer who is as famous in her way as the young girl with the ropes of diamonds is in hers, compliments madame on her dancing, and madame calls the other "mademoiselle," and says, "How very warm it is!" and the circle of men around them, who are leaning on each other's shoulders and standing on benches or tables to look, smile delightedly at the spectacle. They consider it very chic, this combination. It is like a meeting between Madame Bernhardt and Yvette Guilbert.

But the climax of the night was reached last year when the band of a hundred pieces struck buoyantly into the most reckless and impudent of marches and comic songs, "The Man Who Broke the Bank at Monto Carlo." The symbals clashed, and the big guns emphasized the high notes, and the brass blared out boastfully with a confidence and swagger that showed how sure the musicians were of pleasing that particular audience with that particular tune. And they were not disappointed. The three thousand men and women hailed the first bars of the song with a yell of recognition, and then, dancing and strutting to the rythm of the tune, and singing and shouting it in French and English, they raised their voices in such a chorus that they could be heard defiantly proclaiming who they were and what they had done as far as the boulevards. And when they reached the high note in the chorus, the musicians, carried away by the fever of the crowd, jumped upon the chairs and held their instruments

NAPANEE, FRIDAY, JUNE 28, 1895.

How would the old swag, the old brag and deficits do as a rallying cry for the Tories.

As a sample of how the N. P. taxes luxuries, we have a 30 to 40 per cent duty on clothing while diamonds are admitted free.

It is about time to abolish a policy that taxes almost everything in sight from the cradle of the infant to the coffin of the deceased patriarch.

If the Beaver is the acknowledged representative of the Tory party in this district it is a good deal more dangerous to the party than American coal oil.

The Tory Government still pursues its policy of taxing the luxuries of life. Coal oil bears a tax of 100 per cent while the oil of the attar of roses is admitted free.

Willie—Male or female?

Teacher—Male or female? What do you mean?

Willie—There's a big difference. When Pa says he'll be down in a minute, it takes him sixty seconds, but Ma's minutes are about six hundred, 'specially when she's puttin' on her hat.

A Fortunate Accident.

"I am lost!" the prima donna sobbed, "My years of hard study have gone for nothing!"

"Alas, what is the matter?" asked her maid.

"My prospects are ruined, all through a wretched accident. Just as I was approaching the end of my aria a horrid bug flew on the stage and lit on my neck!"

"And you screamed?"

"I did. What else could I do? It was my last scene and I had no chance to redeem myself."

The bell sounded and the maid announced a man from the theater.

"Show him in," said the prima donna. "I may as well meet my fate at once. It is my dismissal from the company."

"'Scuse me, ma'am, fur disturbin' ye," said the visitor, "but de manager wants to know did you run away from your curtain recall 'cause you was took sick?"

"No. I am perfectly well."

allow the cream to get cold before placa cow up.

Care must always be taken not to alow the cream to get cold before placing in the dairy room, for if it is allawed to become completely chilled before straining and setting away the cream will not rise well.

A cow well fed and cared for will not only give more milk, but it will be of a better quality and her milk will make more butter in proportion than a half starved one.

To the North Pole by Balloon.

M. Andre's project for reaching the north pole by balloon is now being examined by a committee of the French Academie des Sciences. Four important conditions must be satisfied; (5) An ascensional power of 6,600 pounds, to carry three observers, their instruments, ballast and provisions for four months; (2) a balloon that shall continue impermeable for four months; (3) conveniences for filling and starting it in the Arctic regions and, finally, some means of directing it. Nordenskjold thinks Andre can carry out his plan.

Married 100 years.

The Hundredth Man has a character of fiction, but it is reserved for sober fact and reality to instance the man who can celebrate his hundredth wedding anniversary. Such a celebration actually occurred during the month of April in a little village of Hungary, Zsombulga by name, the still happy bridegroom being one hundred and sixteen years of age, and named Jean Szathmary, and his bride but a few years his junior.

These people were peasants, and among the poorest in the little Hungarian town, but the fact of their having lived to celebrate so unique an occurrence as the hundredth anniversary of their marriage has made them the most honored citizens of the place. The little municipality of Szombulga has voted them a pension, and so long as they live they will be taken care of by the village. The Viennese journals sent correspondents to describe the old couple in the fullest detail.

by the fever of the crowd, jumped upon the chairs and held their instruments as high above their heads as they could without losing control of that high note, and every one stood on tiptoe, and many on one foot, all holding on to that highest note as long as their breath lasted. It was a triumphant, reckless yell of defiance and delight, it was the war cry of that class of Parisians of which one always reads and which one sees so seldom, which comes to the surface only at unusual intervals, and which, when it does appear, lives up to its reputations, and does not disappoint you.—Richard Harding Davis, in Harper's Magazine for June.

It is proposed to build a railroad from Port Said, at the mouth of the Suez Canal, across Northern Arabia, through Persia and Beloochistan, to Kerrachee, India, a distance of 2,400 miles, at a cost of $75,000,000.

For Contempt of Court.

Opposite the stage station and hotel was a shanty with a sign of "Jale" over the door, and I strolled over there and asked of a man sitting at the door and smoking a pipe:

"Can I take it that this is the County Jail?"

"You kin, sir," he promptly replied.

"Not much of a jail."

"No, sir; but it's a new county, you know."

"Any prisoners inside?"

"No, sir. I'm the only prisoner, and they allow me outside."

"Where's the sheriff or jailor?"

"Gone off hunting."

"And left you alone?"

"All alone. I'm purty comfortable, however, and my time will be out in about six months."

"But I should think you'd run away," I said, as I offered him a cigar.

"Whar to?" he queried in reply. "If I go to Grass Valley, the boys will hang me fur hoss stealing'. If I go to Ridge City, they'll hang me fur stealin' a mewl. Over to Euchre Bend they want me to pull hemp fur robbin' Bill White. I might git up into the mountains, but the durned Indians would try fur my scalp. The safest place fur me is right here, and I hain't sayin' a word."

"My friend, would it hurt your feelings if I should ask why you were sent here?"

"Not a bit, sir. I killed a man."

"You did, eh? But how—how"—

"How did it happen I was sent to jail fur a y'ar insted of bein' hung?"

"Yes?"

"Oh, they didn't keer nuthin' about the killin', and gin me two hull months to walk off in. As I wouldn't go, the Jedge he said it was contempt of court, and sent me up here for ay'ar, so he could hev the use of my coyuse and guns free gratis. Don't happen to hev a new deck of keerds with you, eh?"

"Sorry to say I haven't."

"I was in hopes you had. The Jedge will be up this way to-morrer, and I'd hev the keerds all marked and play him the best three out of five to see whether I drawed pay as jailor or scrubbed along as a prisoner."—St. Louis Republican.

THE TALE OF A FINGER BOWL.

Its Advent, Its Vogue, and Its Final Downthrow in Brownsville.

The finger-bowl struck Brownsville directly after the salted almond, and just before the embroidered centre-piece. Indeed, it followed so closely in the almond's wake that not more than three persons in town had begun to say "ah-mon"—the rest pronounced it "al-mond," and were very flat-footed about it.

The finger-bowl was introduced by Miss Jones at her tea-party. It was a red glass one with dimples, and Miss Jones passed it around herself after the guests had finished their tea. There were floating upon the water sundry thin slices of lemon, and, of course, the first two women drank out of it. Please don't fancy that had you never seen or heard of finger-bowls ou would

Mrs. Petefish was the next to follow the fashion. She had two opalescent bowls with crinkey edges. She said that they were newer. And she dispensed with lemon. She let a geranium leaf float in each bowl, for, as she said, 'geranium has a nasty taste, and those who drink once won't try it again." They didn't. And thus, at two sittings Brownsville was educated up to the finger-bowl. After that it was the rage, for, as Mrs. Petefish remarked, "There's one thing about we Brownsvillets, we pick a thing up quick.

The male Brownvillite never took kindly to this innovation. When it was placed before him, he either quite ignored it, or else he tried to be funny about it, and said that he would "pass." In his heart he hated it.

Still the popularity of the finger-bowl increased, and it came on now in half dozens, with fringed doylies underneath. Even the younger set caught the craze, and some of the pretty girls would sit out dances together to hear about a new pattern of drawn work for a finger-bowl doyley, while the young men awkwardly waltzed about in pairs.

The men began to sneer more openly after this, and occasionally managed to upset and break a bowl as though by accident; but there was no organized revolt.

It was not until Christmas that it got its death warrant.

You see, there were a lot of children in the Rev. Mr. Goodman's family, and as times were hard and his salary behind, the poor man was discouraged and disheartened. So, when on Christmas morning a boy handed in a parcel marked—"For Our Pastor's Wife," it

THE WORLD-REFORMER AND HIS WIFE

Said Farmer John to Joiner Ned:
"Come put a back door on my shed."

Says Joiner Ned to Farmer John:
"I cannot put your back door on.
The Guild I'm interested in
For the abolishment of sin,
Meets at my house this very day,
And so I cannot get away."

"Well, after you've abolished sin
Come down to-morrow and begin;
I want that back door in my shed,"
Said Farmer John to Joiner Ned.

"To-morrow, neither, can I come,
The Friends of the Millennium
Meet at the house of Deacon Kent,
And I am first Vice-President."

"Well then, next Wednesday, without doubt,
When your millennium's started out,
Just let it take its course and spread,
And put that back door on my shed."

"I read an essay Wednesday, John,
Before the Culture Club, upon
'The Easiest Method to Restore
Our Long Lost Eden Here Once More,'
To foster peace, abolish war,
And render virtue popular."

"Well, get you Eden here all right
By sundown prompt, next Wednesday night;
And then, next Thursday morning, Ned,
Come put that back door on my shed."

"The Anti-Hunger Club convenes
Next Thursday, down to Hiram Green's,
And I have promised to orate
On how to crush and extripate
Man's tendency for fish and meat,
His grovelling desire to eat."

"But won't you come down by-and-by,
We'll say two years from next July?
You'll have your various schemes put through,
You'll have the universe built new;
Come down then, with your tool-kit, Ned,
And put that back door in my shed."

"I think," says Ned, "I'll take that chance
If you will pay me in advance;
For my wife says that we've no meat
And no flour in the house to eat;
This cash may save domestic strife,
And kind of pacify my wife."

—SAM WALTER FOSS.

Milwaukee tried the experiment of turning over the vacant land in the city limits for potato patches to be cultivated for the benefit of the poor. Seventy-five acres of land was tendered for this purpose, but only six men appeared to till it.

The Pessimist.

He does nothin' all the livelong day but sit aroun' an' groan,
An' the night-time he makes hidjus with his everlastin' moan;
He never smiles; his face is allers in a puckered frown,
An' he thinks hisself the poores', mos' onlucky cuss in town.
He keers nothin' for theayters, and the circus has no charm
For this miserable critter, and the fire bell's alarm
Kaint rouse him up outen his woe; no more to church he goes—
He's gitten irreljus sence the corns came on his toes.

He hates each sign o' happiness, and if he had his way,
He'd hang the girl acrost the street what's singing all the day;
What right's she got to be so gay when he's so full o' pain?
He bets if he got hol' o' her, she'd never sing again!
To heer o' balls an' parties causes him an extry pang;
What keers he now for dancin' and the fiddle's horrid twang?
He finds no scent in vi'let and no beauty in the rose—
There's nothin' pretty to the man with corns upon his toes.

To him life's not worth livin; to him the heavens' blue
Has given place to mournin' black; the treetops' summer hue
Is yaller, dull an' gloomy-like; to him the songbird's strain
Sounds like the scratchin' of a nail acrost the window pane.
To him the sun's onwelcum, and the laff of girls an' boys
He calls a cussed nuisance, and he tells 'em hush their noise.
He hates his wife an' children; in his heart no gladness grows—He's what they call a pessimist sence corn came on his toes.

mas morning a boy handed in a parcel marked—"For Our Pastor's Wife," It was almost with tears in his eyes that he carried it to his spouse.

"For you, dear," he said with a little quaver in his voice, as he began to unwrap the paper covering; "I do hope it's a black silk gown, for you need one so much. I don't mind all this poverty myself, but for you, my brave little woman; it is too—And then he saw the finger-bowls—six of them—red, blue green, yellow, opal and purple.

* * * * * *

Bobby Petefish looked at the world through a rosy mist, and Bill Simpkins surveyed his mother through a golden glass.

"What! where did you boys get that colored glass?" she queried sharply.

"In the alley behind the minister's house," snickered Bill, producing a pocketful of glittering bits—red, blue, green, yellow, opal and purple.

The reign of the finger-bowl declined rapidly after that, and now it is as a tale that is told. And to this day, when the Rev. Mr. Goodman walks abroad, the men of Brownsville say, "Ah! there goes a man!"—Puck.

Found the Missing Word.

A hotel clerk told this story: Three men from the country came into the hotel and registered for lodging, and a few minutes later two of them went out to see the town. "I will stay here," said the third, "and look at things," and he took a seat near the door.

At 10 o'clock, a half an hour later, the man who was left went up to the clerk.

"I want to remain," said he.

"All right sir," answered the clerk. The man stood back and looked at the clerk and finally went back to his chair near the door.

He sat still another hour and returned to the desk. "If you please, I'll remain," he said.

"That's all right sir," was the response. "We hope you'll be with us some time." The man hesitated and went back to the chair.

It was after midnight when he went up to the clerk for the third time. "I think I'll remain, sir," he said.

"We have no objections," answered the man behind the desk.

The guest did not go back to his chair, however, but stood still. Shortly afterward another guest came up and asked the clerk for his key, "and I'll retire—"

"Retire! Retire! That's the word I've been trying to think of for three hours. For heaven's sake let me retire," interrupted the man who had desired to remain, and he was at last happy.

Compensation.

"Yes," sighed the Hammock, regretfully, "it was my fault that those sweet young people fell out."

"Never mind," rejoined the Bicycle-Built-for-Two, with a merry little twinkle in its nickel-plated spokes, "I shall see to it that they are thrown together."

MR. BINK'S DAY OFF.

A Study of a Clerk's Holiday.

When Binks was coming up town in a Broadway cable car one afternoon he caught some superficial glances of Madison Square as he ducked his head to peek through between a young woman's bonnet and a young man's newspaper. The green of the little park vaguely astonished Binks. He had grown accustomed to a white and brown park; now, all at once, it was radiant green. The grass, the leaves, had come swiftly, silently, as if a great green light from the sky had shone suddenly upon the little desolate hued place.

The vision cheered the mind of Binks. It cried to him that nature was still supreme; he had begun to think the banking business to be the pivot on which the universe turned. Produced by this wealth of young green, faint, faraway voices called to him. Certain subtle memories swept over him. The million leaves looked into his soul and said something sweet and pure in an unforgotten song, the melody of his past. Binks began to dream.

When he arrived at the little Harlem flat he sat down to dinner with an air of profound dejection, which Mrs. Binks promptly constructed into an insult to her cooking, and to the time and thought she had expended in preparing the meal. She promptly resented it. "Will, what's the matter now?" she demanded. Apparently she had asked this question ten thousand times.

"Nothin'," said Binks, shortly, filled with gloom. He ment by this remark that his ailment was so subtle that her feminine mind would not be enlightened by any explanation.

The head of the family was in an ugly mood. The little Binkses suddenly paused in their uproar and became very wary children. They knew that it would be dangerous to do anything irrelevant to their father's bad temper. They studied his face with their large eyes, filled with childish seriousness and speculation. Meanwhile they ate with the most extraordinary caution. They handled their little forks with such care that there was barely a sound. At each slight movement of their father they looked apprehensively at him, expecting the explosion.

The meal continued amid a sombre silence. At last, however, Binks spoke, clearing his throat of the indefinite rage that was in it and looking over at his wife. The little Binkses seemed to inwardly dodge, but he merely said: "I wish I could get away into the country for awhile!"

His wife bristled with that brave anger which agitates a woman when she sees fit to assume that her husband is weak spirited. "If I worked as hard as you do, if I slaved over those old books the way you do, I'd have a vacation once in awhile or I'd tear their old office down." Upon her face was a Roman determination. She was a men upon the porch of a battered grocery store shaded their eyes with their hands. The Binkses felt dimly like a circus and were a trifle bewildered by it. Binks gazed up and down, this way and that; he tried to be unaware of the stare of the citizens. Finally, he approached the loungers, who straightened their forms suddenly and looked very expectant.

"Can you tell me where Miss Pattison lives?"

The loungers arose as one man. "It's th' third house up that road there."

"It's a white house with green shutters!"

"There, that's it—yeh can see it through th' trees!" Binks discerned that his wife's aunt was a well-known personage, and also that the coming of the Binkses was an event of vast importance. When he marched off at the head of his flock, he felt like a drum-major. His course was followed by the unwavering, intent eyes of the loungers.
